Archbishop Manning is about to publish a work on Papal Infallibility.

The great grand-daughter of Sir Walter Scott is a devout Roman Catholic.

Rev. Paul Bradley, for many years priest of Candonagh, Donegal, is dead.

In the city of London there are 117 Catholic churches and chapels and 214 priests.

A new Catholic church was dedicated at Minneapolis, Minn., New Year's Day.

Mgr. Matteo Agostino Mengucci, Bishop of Civita Castellana, Italy, is dead. He was eighty-seven years of age.

Rev. John Smith, late curate of Lisdoogh, in the county of Leitrim, died recently at his mother's residence near Cavan.

Miss Martha Whitney was received into the Order of Charity in Boston on the 11th December, by Rev. Father Welch, S. J.

There have been over 1,112 processions in Poland this year for the benefit of the Holy Father, and over 108,000 persons took part in them.

The Christian Brothers' School attached to the Cathedral, Providence, R. I., is so full that they are obliged to refuse applicants for admittance.

Very Rev. Dr. McCaffrey has resigned, through ill health, the Presidency of Mt. St. Mary's College, Emmettsburg, Md., which he filled so efficiently for the last forty years.

The basilicas and churches in the city and province of Rome, Italy, yield a revenue of 5,436,536 francs. The aggregate of income from convents, monasteries, churches, etc., is 8,317,439 francs.

The Dublin Gazette contains a list of bequests of the late Earl of Dunraven. They amount to twenty-six thousand pounds, and are all for religious purposes connected with the Catholic Church.

On December 15th the Most Rev. John Leonard was solemnly consecrated Lord Bishop of the extensive and important diocese of Capetown, South Africa, in succession to the late lamented Most Rev. Dr. Grimley.

Miss Margaret Harrington, of Montreal (in religion Sister St. Pierre), died at the Ursuline Convent in Galveston, Texas, on the 6th ult. She was in the forty-fourth year of her age, and the twenty-sixth of her religious profession.

The old wooden church built by the Canadian settlers forty years ago at Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, has been replaced by a fine stone structure. It seats about 1,200, was made by a mixture of Irish, Scotch, French, English, German, Italian and Indians.

Rev. C. Dannisler, formerly assistant priest to Father Elzan, of Swan Creek, St. Clair county, Mich., has been appointed pastor of Lexington, in place of Rev. M. Cantera, who has been appointed assistant pastor to Mgr. Father Murray, in Pellatti, Wayne county, Mich.

Mgr. the Bishop of Perigueux has joined the Catholic Union. The bishop of France who already take active part in the great work are the Archbishops of Bordeaux, Aix and Bourges, the Bishops of Versailles, Perpignan, Frejus, Puy, Vannes, Montauban, Saint-Claude, Charleville, St. Dié, Versailles, Nantes, Grenoble and Nevers.

Mr. William O'Donnell, late parish priest of Rosslyn and Monkswood, Co. Wexford, after four years' suffering from constitutional debility, died in November in the twenty-ninth year of his age and the fifth of his sacred ministry. He was educated by the Jesuits in Limerick.

The Month's Mind of the Very Reverend Lane has been celebrated in the parish church of Dowdallshill, Ireland. The deceased clergyman, who was only twenty-four years of age, had been but three years ordained, two of which he had spent on the American Mission in Boston.

We have to note another conversion, says the London Register of December 7th. The Rev. John Higgins, curate of St. Mary Magdalen, Taunton, was received into the Catholic Church on Friday last. Mr. Higgins was a Cambridge man, and was ordained deacon at Christmas last by the Anglican Bishop of Bath and Wells.

The Vicar Apostolic of India speaks very hopefully of the prospects of the Church in that country. He had recently opened a fine church at Allahabad, and another, with a school and convent of Irish nuns attached to it, at Patna. Their mission is supported by the contribution of native and foreign Catholics.

A dispatch from Richmond of the 30th ult. conveys the pleasant intelligence that the Holy Leaders of the Church of the Visitation, died in that city on the previous evening, aged 98. The deceased was a daughter of the late David Williamson, of Baltimore county, and had been a religious for upwards of thirteen years.

The London Church Herald says that Sir John Duke Coleridge, the eminent English lawyer, married a protege and the judgeship of the diocese court because his conscience would not permit him to work in such iniquitous business. He is brother of the eminent Jesuit of that name, one of the leaders in Stonyhurst College.

The N. Y. Observer, in its peculiar vein, protests against Bismarck's persecution of the Catholic Church in Germany, on the ground that "he is serving the Roman Catholics as they have always served Protestants when they had the power or need of any country in their hands, and it is indecorous against which, in the name of Christiany, we desire to protest."

The Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin and the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Lord Bishop of Maitland, consecrated the new peal of bells for the new church of St. Augustine and John, Thomas street, Dublin, recently. The bells—eight in number—were ranged in line, perched from strong supports, decorated with evergreen, and a nobler peal it would be hard to find.

The Fredericton Reporter says: "Father Rev. Donald Bliss of Westmoreland, N. B., has stepped over to the Church of Rome. He preached his last sermon yesterday, on Sunday, the 8th instant. He is the second reverend gentleman, brought up and educated in Presbyterian views, who of late months has joined the religion which he had preached for many a year. Who comes next?

Bishop Loughlin, in Brooklyn, and the Mother of Mercy of the Orphan Asylum have united in declining the canceling by the city of Brooklyn of the $2,500 annexed to their institution for lostermants, on the ground that they are unwilling to avail themselves of a favor that is the result of special legislation. The affair created considerable excitement in all classes, and the Mayor finally withdrew the measure.

It is stated that the Catholics of Jersey City have offered to purchase the Harrison estate on the Heights, at a price in advance of that at which the sale was to have been made to the city. The city agreed to purchase the estate for a city hall and public offices for the sum of $350,000, but the contract has never been completed. It is understood that the Catholics want the land for college purposes.

On Easter Sunday, 10 A. M., James Cathedral, Brooklyn, Bishop Loughlin promoted to the priesthood the deacons Rev. Francis S. Gardiner and Rev. Henry Zimmer. Father Zimmer has been educated in St. Francis Xavier's, New York, and the Seminary, Niagara. Father Gardiner has studied in Rome. He is a brother of the late Hev. D. Gardiner, whose premature death deprived the diocese of an accomplished and gifted priest.

The Rev. Father Maher, P. P., of Carlow Craigue, is at present in a very low state, and slight hopes are entertained of his recovery. He is over eighty years of age and was a contemporary of some of the greatest Irishmen of the last half century—O'Connell, Dr. Doyle, Dr. Cahill, Lord Cloncurry and others. He is uncle to Cardinal Cullen, and his Eminence has been to see him in his illness some time ago.

The Catholic Church in Great Britain has about 2,500 priests, 1,020 churches, 82 religious communities for men, 280 for women and 4,500,000 lay members. Since 1850, when the English hierarchy was restablished, in the person of Cardinal Wiseman, after an ostiection of nearly three hundred years, the harvest has indeed been great, but God has sent a proportionate increase of laborers for that portion of his vineyard.

The Young Catholic's Friend Society of Washington has agreed to affiliate with the Society of the Apostleship of Prayer. The Baltimore Sun says: "This is the first movement for an aggregation of Young Catholics' Friend Societies with other organizations. These associations, which owe their origin to Baltimore, have been started in all city Catholic churches of Maryland, Virginia and the District of Columbia for over a third of a century."

On Sunday, December 22d, Bishop Grace, of St. Paul, Minnesota, conferred the order of Subdeaconship on Alphonsus Kinsky, Vincentius Scheifler and Bernard Lecknicker, of the Order of St. Benedict. They were raised to the priesthood on the 28th. Holy Orders were at the same time conferred on Rev. Mr. Pedersen, Father Pedersen is the only Norwegian priest in the Northwest. He will conduct missions among his people in the diocese, having been set out from Norway especially for that purpose.

A ceremony of peculiar interest, as being the first of its kind that has occurred in England since the Reformation—at least with respect to the Benedictine Order—was celebrated lately in the small but richly ornamented chapel connected with the Collegiate and Monastery of St. Augustine, at Ramsgate. The occasion was no less than the solemn blessing of a mitred Abbot, according to the ancient rite contained in the Roman Pontifical. The Abbot who received the mitre was the Right Rev. Father Wilfrid Alcock, Abbot Visitor of the Anglo-Belgian Province of the Carsiners congregation.

On Thursday evening of last week the Ignatian Literary Society attached to St. Ignatius' church in the city elected the following officers: President, E. M. Naimi, S. Cunningham; Assistant Librarian, T. H. Grimm. Board of Directors—Jas. F. Sullivan, A. M., (reelected); John T. O'Day (reelected); Chas. Dunn (reelected). Introduction Committee—John Clark, Jr., (reelected), Jas. F. Sullivan, A. M., (reelected), Joseph A. Buckley (reelected).

The Right Rev. Father Paul Cahill, General of the Dominican Order, expired peacefully in his cell at Rome, on the 10th inst., says the London Tablet of December 21st. He was attended in his last moments by the parish priest of the Minerva, and other clergy and friends. The friars of the convent were assembled in the vast aula adjoining the cell, and, according to the usages of the Order, sang the Salve Regina while the soul was passing. Father Jandel was the countryman of the late and the present French Dominicans, Lacordaire and Besson. His loss is very keenly felt both in Rome and by Catholics throughout Europe. The funeral obsequies were celebrated with great magnificence in the Church of the Minerva, on the 15th instant. Several Cardinals and many other persons of distinction were present, and an immense concourse of people.

ORDINATIONS.

Formerly, was President, consecutively, of Hobart College, in Western New York, and of Kenyon College, in Ohio. He is one of both colleges of the Protestant Episcopal denomination. The reverend gentleman has become a member of the Community of St. Paul the Apostle.

Kelly's Case.

A serious doubt seems to exist as to whether the prisoner Kelly, who stands charged with the perpetration of the outrage in North Great George street, is now in legal custody. On Friday week Mr. Butt applied on his behalf to the Lord Chief Justice for a writ of habeas corpus. His urgent ground was, that the police magistrate had illegally remanded Kelly to Kilmainham on the 19th October; and, secondly, that if he remanded him at all after that date, he did so in the prisoner's absence, and that, therefore, the prisoner was in legal custody only up to the 26th October. Price, the Governor of Kilmainham, asked to be heard by counsel, but the Chief Justice refused the request, and granted a conditional order for the writ, the whole question to be discussed before him on Tuesday.

On Saturday, the authorities, making sure, we suppose, that they were doing the thing properly this time, had Kelly brought up at the Northern Divisional Police Court for the purpose of getting a further remand. But here again counsel for the prisoner appeared and warned the magistrate that his client was not in legal custody, and that, therefore, he could not be legally remanded. The magistrate, however, received evidence that the wounded man Murphy was still in hospital, and unable, in the principal surgeon's opinion, to leave that place without serious risk; and on this evidence remanded the application of the Crown. The authorities have not waited for Mr. Murphy's recovery to take his informations. On Wednesday, Chief Magistrate O'Donnell attended in Jervis-street hospital for the purpose. The prisoner also attended, and Mr. Murphy, Q. C., on behalf of the Crown, examined the wounded man and his medical attendant, Dr. Hughes. On the vital question of identification, Mr. Murphy said he did not recollect seeing the prisoner on the night of the outrage.—Nation, December 21.

The Education Question.

The Bishops have published a pastoral letter issued an eloquent warning against the so-called "National" Board of Education in Ireland, respecting a document they want the members to sign. This document tends to snap the only tie which joins the teachers and the Catholic clergy, and to make them entirely dependent on the Government Commissioners. Against such tyranny the venerable and patriotic prelate protests in the following forcible language: "From their first inauspicious creation the Commissioners have been going on from bad to worse, constantly prompted from insane motions, and all having for their object to establish in the country a despotism which at the commencement they would not have dreamt of, and which only from the servitude made tolerable by habit and long judgment could Catholics could endure. Fortunately such is the usual fate of inordinate pretensions in all regulated public bodies, that they at length met bitter disappointment where they thought they could command support. This arbitrary Board issues its instructions to its well-paid staff of obsequious subordinates—the Inspectors—to labor for the consummation of their tyranny in procuring from the managers of National schools a formal assent to this last and worst of their long series of assaults, during forty years, on the free education of the Catholic youth of Ireland."

The Green Flag in Cork Harbor.

Quite a sensation was produced at Queenstown on Saturday by the appearance of a vessel into the harbor flying a green flag, bearing a representation of a harp without the crown. The strange sight was first observed by the dwellers at Rocky Island, who assembled in considerable numbers and cheered the vessel as she sailed in. Her ensign of a number of gentlemen who met in conference at the Gresham Hotel on Saturday. Among those present were Mr. J. P. Ronayne, M. P., and Mr. R. Blennerhassett, M. P. After considerable discussion, in the course of which several gentlemen detailed instances of gross discriminations on the part of prison officials in this country and in England, a resolution was passed advising the Amnesty Association to lay the facts of Mr. Reddin's case before counsel, with a view to having prosecutions instituted against the inculpated officers.—Nation, December 21.

Another Irish Bishop.

The Rev. Dr. Leonard, curate of Blanchardstown, and lately designated to the Catholic See of Ogdensburg, vacant through the death of the Most Rev. Dr. Grimsley, was consecrated Bishop on Sunday last in the chapel attached to the Dominican Convent, Cabra. Four or five bishops, in addition to his Eminence Cardinal Cullen, attended the sacred ceremony, which was carried out with the usual pomp and solemnity. The Bishop of Ardagh, the Most Rev. Dr. Conroy, preached the sermon.—Nation December 21.

Shutting the Gates.

This year's celebration of the anniversary of the "Shutting of the Gates" of Derry was gone through in the usual fashion on Wednesday. Bells were rung, there was a discharge of cannon, a shooting of muskets, flags, a march in processional order, a service in the Cathedral, and the usual affair was brought to a conclusion without serious risk; and on this evidence remand the application of the Crown. The authorities have not waited for Mr. Murphy's recovery to take his informations. On Wednesday, Chief Magistrate O'Donnell attended in Jervis-street hospital for the purpose. The prisoner also attended, and Mr. Murphy, Q. C., on behalf of the Crown, examined the wounded man and his medical attendant, Dr. Hughes. On the vital question of identification, Mr. Murphy said he did not recollect seeing the prisoner on the night of the outrage.—Nation, December 21.

Quite a sensation was produced at Queenstown on Saturday by the appearance of a vessel into the harbor flying a green flag, bearing a representation of a harp without the crown. The strange sight was first observed by the dwellers at Rocky Island, who assembled in considerable numbers and cheered the vessel as she sailed in. Her appearance, of course, attracted the attention of the garrison of the forts, who in large numbers crowded the cliffs and looked down upon the very suspicious craft in admiration—bewilderment. On she came, heedless of the commotion she was causing, and steering from the centre of an American vessel anchored inside the forts a round of vociferous cheering. When passing Spike Island, the "green" (to the astonishment of everybody, ran up the Austrian flag at the peak. A considerable amount of boasting was gathered on the beach at Queenstown, and hailed the national colors with remarks and cheering as the vessel glided by the town under easy sail, her crew returning the salutations as heartily. When she took up her berth in Monkstown reach, it was found that (although an American) her name was the Erin, and that she was commanded by Captain Goldenich, well known in Queenstown. The secret of the proceedings that revealed such a demonstration is, no doubt, to be found in the fact that the captain's wife is an Irish lady.—Cork Herald.

More Pluck.

Another vacancy on the Judicial Bench—another place open for some Whig barrister. Judge Lynch, of the Landed Estates Court, who had been in bad health for some weeks, died on Wednesday last. Judge Lynch bore the reputation of an amiable man and a good judge. Who is to be his successor? It may with safety be assumed that he will not be Mr. Pallas, for the Attorney-General, as already stated, has declined to take a high place and a judgeship of the Landed Estates' Court is not quite an object to a barrister. Surgeon Shekleton, perhaps; may be the fortunate man; and, indeed, it would be a good thing for the whole Bench if the gentleman was to be "provided for" in some way, in order to open the King's County to the Attorney-General. The rumor is now revived, and we suppose in a few days' time at the farthest it will be shown whether it is well founded.—Nation, December 21.

The Phœnix Park Affray.

Another of the numerous actions at law arising out of the Phœnix Park outrage of August, '71, has been undergoing trial during the week in the Court of Exchequer before the Lord Chief Baron. The plaintiff is a Mr. Fraser, and the defendants are Under-Secretary Burke, Colonel Lake and Superintendent Myers. Mr. Fraser is a member of the press, and attended the Phœnix Park meeting in the capacity of a reporter for the Freeman's Journal. He alleges that he was positively doing nothing but discharging his duties as a reporter when he was knocked down and brutally maltreated by policemen; and he certainly was so seriously injured on the occasion that he was obliged to be abed for some weeks after the meeting in question. The evidence given in the case is substantially the same as that offered for the plaintiff in the case of Mr. F. J. O'Byrne against Lord Hartington and others.—Nation, Dec. 21.

The Case of Daniel Sodders.

The charges of cruelty brought by Daniel Sodder and Messrs. Glynn and Walsh, of Manchester, against the prison officials of Chatham and Millbank, engaged the attention of the Magistrates, at Bow-street Police Court, on Monday by the examination

CATHOLIC CHARITIES IN NEW YORK.

A few days ago the Chronicle had a brief article, the gist of which was an assertion that, in the disbursement of Government funds for charitable purposes in New York, favor was shown to Catholic institutions. The sole proof vouchsafed for this very grave insinuation was a citation of the amounts allowed to the two denominations. The Catholics received nearly one hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars, while the Protestants little more thirty-eight thousand and, therefore, according to the Chronicle, either the latter were unjustly treated or the former were extravagantly endowed. This argument, put in different shape, has been repeated a thousand times by persons who have no scruple about creating sectarian antagonism, and who never think of inquiring into the foundation for their charges. We do not undertake to question the correctness of the figures quoted, but shall allow them to be authentic; yet, even with this assumption, we can easily show that our coreligionists have not been more liberally dealt with than they deserved. Any one in the least acquainted with New York is aware that the great bulk of the poor population, from which those who inhabit the refuges and asylums chiefly come, is Catholic; and, therefore, on this ground alone, our coreligionists might claim the larger share of the State grant. But, again, nearly all the Protestant poor are provided for in the Government institutions. The teaching there suits them and they do not complain of the deprivation of religious instruction.

On the other hand, Catholics have unconquerable scruples against permitting their destitute or helpless to be brought up under any educational system which is not based on religion. So they are forced by conscience to erect refuges, asylums, orphanages and reformatories of their own. They only ask that the Government to pay a portion of the expenses, the whole of which it would have to bear if they did not erect the buildings and contribute to these maintenance. Were these not erected, or sufficient reason why Protestant asylums, etc., should be built at all—seeing that those provided by the State are Protestant enough for every one of the sects. Finally, the allowances made to the several denominations are distributed according to the number of persons entitled to it. We acknowledge, without hesitation, that the sum given to Catholic institutions is greatly in excess of that donated to Protestant; but all such a circumstance proves is that there are more inmates in the former than in the latter. We presume the Chronicle will admit that a house which trains and educates seven hundred boys or girls, ought to receive a larger grant out of the public funds than one which only provides for, say, two-thirds of that number. We may also remark it has been abundantly proven that the Catholic institutions are far better managed, far more economical, and far more successful than any others whatsoever. As soon as our contemporary comes across a real case of injustice or favoritism, it shall have our help in righting it.

THE HARBOR COMMISSION FRAUDS.

Mr. Harbor Commissioner MARES demurred to the complaint filed by Mr. L. F. CRANE for the reason that it was too vague and contained no specific charges. The complaint, to oblige him, has been amended, and now he has no grounds whatever for such an objection to the document. The charges are particular and specific enough to suit the most fastidious defendant, and all the public want to know is what answer will be given to them. At present they are somewhat of the opinion that Mr. MARES and his good little boy, TOMMY, had a right good thing in the wharfage and dockage and commissions and promotations, and they are anxious to be disabused of that impression, if possible. For instance, it would be a huge relief to the citizens generally to know that Mr. MARES did not receive two thousand Are hundred dollars and other little douceurs from the Central Pacific Railroad Company for his stanching a couple of leaks in their wharf; that he did not get two hundred dollars per month from the firm of GARDE & SHABLE, or two hundred and fifty per month from TUBBUS & MARVIN, or one hundred and fifty per month from GODDARD & KELLOG. In like manner his fellow citizens are very desirous that Mr. MARES should prove to their satisfaction that the trifling sum of ten thousand dollars was not "slipped" from funds belonging to the State, for his special benefit, by obliging wharfingers during the year of grace 1871. And that handsome silver service would look much more lustrous on Mr. MARES'S sideboard if it were shown, per rasan demonstratif, that it was paid by the Commissioners' employés out of their own honest earnings, and not out of money belonging to the city and county of San Francisco. Then there are small dredging jobs and filling jobs, and commissions on work done and performed, to be accounted for. Mr. MARES' answer is eagerly awaited.

A REPROOF TO BIGOTRY.

For some reason that we cannot wholly understand the ultra Protestant, or Orange, party have espoused the cause of the individual known as the THURSDAY claimant. The man, if he has any religion in him at all, which we doubt, is a Catholic; he has married a woman who is of the same creed, and, we believe, his children—whether any are alive yet we know not—were baptized by a priest. The funds to prosecute his "claim" to the broad lands and ancient honors of the THURSDAYS were subscribed partly by speculators and partly by anti-Catholic fanatics. The fraud of this, the most extraordinary trial of the nineteenth century, is well known. The "claimant" was accused of wholesale perjury, and, in default of bail, which was demanded in a very large amount, was sent to prison. There he languished for a considerable time, until the exertions of his Orange friends, at the head of whom stand the members of Parliament, Messrs. WHALLEY and OTHLOW, succeeded in procuring bondsmen. Since his release the quondam butcher-boy of Wagga-Wagga has been going about England lecturing to "Protestant Halls" and making the abolition of Christian charity. The funds derived from his "entertainments" are hardly sufficient to pay lawyers' fees, and they certainly will never put him in possession of the estate he covets, though they may possibly save him from the consequences of the accusation brought against him. The opposition to his "claim" is ascribed by all his friends to "Jesuitry" and "Papistical intrigues," and other agencies equally terrible in the eyes of the evangelical. Mr. WHALLEY and Mr. OTHLOW for months past have been vehement in their denunciations of the supposititious "popish intriguers," and they have not even stopped at this, but have ventilated the most scandalous defamations against the characters of all those who have openly or indirectly been connected with the defense. One of their latest exploits in this line was the charging of the Solicitor-General, Sir JOHN COLERIDGE, with corruption. For this, however, inasmuch as it was more definite than wholesale slanders upon "Romish priests," they were brought to task and we learn they have been condemned to pay a fine of five hundred dollars each. The penalty is absurdly small, but the moral of its infliction is most important. If equally prompt punishment were meted out to the many who are incessantly traducing the Catholic priesthood and religious, there would be a speedy end put to all the high-pitched denunciations of "Rome," to which so many sectarian pulpits ring every Sunday.

DEATH OF THE NOVELIST, BULWER LYTTON.

The telegraph informed us on last Sunday that the well-known novelist, EDWARD LYTTON, had died in London on the previous day. He was then about sixty-seven years old, having been born in Cockfullahire in 1805. He was the son of a General BULWER, and took the name LYTTON upon the occasion of his accession to a large estate which he inherited from his mother. A baronetcy was conferred upon the family after the coronation of Queen VICTORIA, and about six years ago he was raised to the peerage under the title of Lord LYTTON. But it is not with his title, which in his way was ennobling enough, but with his writings that we propose to deal. Although they certainly achieved a great popularity and were extensively read, it is probable that they will soon follow their author into oblivion. And, candidly speaking, we do not think the world will suffer any great loss thereby. BULWER, to call him by his proper appropriation, did not in any of his writings show belief to revealed religion, and it is doing him no injustice to say that he was a deist, if not actually an atheist. In philosophy he was a follower of the German HEGEL, and the mischievous principles of idealism, as a matter of course, permeate all his novels. Hence they are extremely immoral in tone, and the immorality is none the less dangerous because it is generally veiled with a veil of fine phraseology and maudlin sentimentality. His idealism was so pronounced that he taught, substantially, there was no fundamental distinction between right and wrong—between virtue and vice; and that these things should only be judged as they present themselves to the individual mind. In "Pelham," in "Eugene Aaltavera," in "Alice, or the Mystery," and others of his most popular stories, he paints the gravest offenses against morality and society, in such attractive colors that, to the ordinary observer, their criminal nature is altogether invisible. He has palliation and excuse, if not positive commendation, for conduct that strikes at the very foundation of Christian society and the subversion of legitimate authority. It was, perhaps, to this singular moral obliquity the fact that he never succeeded in portraying a true lady or gentleman was owing; although, belonging to the aristocracy, he drew most of his characters from its ranks. We constantly find his heroes and heroines doing mean and unworthy acts, which the dullest and most unpolished plebeian would instinctively shrink from. Probably, however, his characters were true to nature; but if they were, the British aristocracy must be anything but an admirable body. His "Caxton Novel" is, in our opinion, the best written and the least harmful of his productions; but even in that serious defects exist. Like many literary men of the day, Lord LYTTON was very unhappy in his domestic relations. He separated from his wife—a lady of considerable talent, and temper, too, it must be confessed—and she publicly accused him of endeavoring to get her incarcerated in a mad-house. Some of her conduct would, however, go far towards justifying him. On one occasion she went so far as to make her appearance on the platform where he was addressing the electors of Lincoln, and indulge in personal abuse of him and his friends for nearly half an hour.

THE CAUGHLIN TRAGEDY.

Rather more than a fortnight ago two young men, not enjoying the best reputation, JOHN and JERRY CAUGHLIN, got into a dispute with the conductor of car No. 19, on the Bay View line. They refused to pay their fare, a trick not unusual with them, and were in consequence put off. One of them was foolish enough to endeavor to get on the car again, and was rewarded for his trouble by a smart blow on the head with an instrument called a switch-iron. That he was very properly served, nobody will deny. But the recipient of the punishment did not think so himself, and, true to the turbulent instincts of his class, he resolved to get even with the conductor, McCORMACK. His idea of "getting even" was, it appears, to plant a pistol bullet somewhere in the body of his chastiser, and with fatal effect, if possible. He made no secret of his intention; he eschewed the ambush of the conductor, and spent a great part of last Saturday evening looking for him. McCORMACK was told of the threats, and knew very well there was deadly danger in them—so he took measures to protect himself. How did he do this? By availing himself of the power of the law—by appealing to the police—by swearing out a warrant and getting it. CAUGHLIN placed under bonds to keep the peace? Nothing of the kind. He invests some dollars in a revolver, carefully loads it, and then goes to his ordinary and lies in ambush with their number; yet, they have held to pay for weeks, and actually leased in desperate bottle, four hundred and fort; two whites—two hundred of whom were United States regular troops! A foreigner reading of this circumstance would, very probably, come to the conclusion that the American soldiers, regulars not volunteers, must have been arrant cowards! but such a judgment would be altogether erroneous, for hewer or more daring troops than our's are not to be found under any flag. During a whole day they fought against enemies with their numbers, yet they were baffled; when they had lost in killed and wounded nearly one-tenth of their entire strength. It is a matter of doubt whether they injured a single man of the Modocs; but this is probability is that they did not. Thirteen men were killed and twenty-three wounded in an ill-concerted and badly managed attack upon foes amply ensconced in hiding places in almost impregnable position. The troops spent all their time fruitlessly firing at the bushes and the rocks, because the Indians were invisible from the beginning to the end of the affray. Howitzers had been brought up to the scene of hostilities for the purpose of shelling the Modocs out of their retreat, but they were not used lest they should injure the soldiers who had been sent to attack the "lava-beds" in the rear. Now we are told it will require seven hundred and fifty or a thousand men to dispense or destroy "Captain Jack's" band, and of course the country will be put to thousands of dollars expense. It would certainly have been much cheaper to let the Modocs alone, inasmuch as they were not interfering with anybody and were peaceably disposed. The attempt to drive them back upon a reservation, where they would undoubtedly perish from cold and starvation, is, we believe, due to some of those heartless land-jobbers who, as they do none of the fighting themselves, care comfortably little how many lives are lost, provided they can succeed in their mercenary intrigues. There is, to tell the honest truth, a great deal of sympathy for "Captain Jack" and his brave companions among respectable and reputable citizens, who wish to see our soldiers engaged in some more noble and more heroic work than endeavoring to exterminate a few Indians, whose only crime was a refusal to inhabit a tract of country which could not furnish them the necessaries for even their wretched mode of existence.

THE "ALTA" AND THE TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

Our respected contemporary, the Alta, is now suffering the disagreeable consequences of opposing a great monopoly. It chose to espouse the side of the people's enemy in the Postal Telegraph, and thereby earned the enmity of the Western Union Company, which, of course, does not like to be cut out of existence by a rival enterprise conducted by the Federal authorities. Ever since the day of that memorable dispute between the Alta and the Union it has been the acknowledged thing in the world to get up a dispute between two parties when the stronger wants it very particularly. The Alta thought fit and proper to trade with the Union, and volunteered a long special telegram from San Diego about the wreck of a steamship for a dispatch from the theatre of hostilities with the Modocs, and inasmuch as the Chronicle is not a telegraphic agent of the Western Union, that company took umbrage, notwithstanding the fact that the telegram was the Alta's private property, forwarded by its special correspondent. Then the Western Union commenced to charge our contemporary for the telegrams, not as shrouded in the dispatches, but as extended and "padded" in the columns of the paper. Next, not content with that, it commenced to charge "commercial" instead of "press" rates, the difference being in some instances as much as fifty per cent. The Alta refused to pay the overcharge. Then it was cut out of a telegram that if the little bills were not promptly settled, no more dispatches would be forwarded to the office.

Now, our contemporary has been one of the very best customers that the telegraph company possessed, having by this time paid it to hard cash more than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and it is probably known before hand, which can equally well be avoided by the payment of a few dollars, that it would be right to demand that MCCORMACK should abandon even temporarily the service of his employers, and quit his lawful advocation for the purpose of hunting down and shooting the bloodthirsty slayer. But having left it for any purpose, or availing himself of leisure time, he assumed: should have sought for a warrant rather than for a shooter. McCORMACK, who is now five shooter. in jail accused of the murder of JULLEN-DORE, was, in like manner, threatened; but made every effort to procure a warrant for the apprehension of the man he ultimately shot. We do not wish to compare the circumstances immediately attendingthis slaying of MULLENDORE with those which transpired last Saturday evening on the driver's platform of car No. 19, on Bay View line. But we do think that MCCORMACK ought have imitated MCCLELLAND'S action with regard to the warrant, and ought be held to answer before the Police Judge, "in Bonds, that a supposition will be made, and that it has been made to the Legislature, in regard to the conduct of Senators and Representatives, that settled composite, but inamplee on all principles of Christian Ethics, and that in spite of the wishes of the clergy and their dependence, and for making harder in the slightest degree. It is one of the shining points in our history, gleaming through the darkness of the past like the brightest Irish eyes love to dwell. Therefore, in the large history of Ireland, Mr. Mahaffy has taken care to record, that at that bright Summer day, General Munro ascended along the merchants bank of the Black water with a formidable bank of Irish, and that he would dishodge and depose the Irish chiefs and their chamees. But he knew little of the soldier opposed to him,—an officer trained in the Peninsula and Spain, as the defense of Arras against a Marshal of France; and O'Neill of Ulster, full of kindness in pushing against the covenanting leaders had also the innocent blood of the Bishop of Down and Connor, Dr. Leslie, on his hands. For at Newry, Belfast, Carrickfergus, Coleraine, Londonderry, Enniskillen, and Derry, the Presbyterian Bill, now before the Legislature, was opposed by the Presbyterian clergy, and the Presbyterian laity, who, in the year 1798, had been in arms against the Government, and who, in 1641, had been in arms against the Government, and who, in 1641, had been in arms against the Government, and who, in 1641

CHAMBER SCENE.

"The room throbs with unvisited sleep
And I creep my bed soft down by her,
To learn a fine whisper, breathed a prayer.
Her snow white hands together pressed—
Her hope upon sheltered in the lid,
Her folded lines on her breast.
I feel swelling with the charms it hid!
And from her long sad dreaming
Escaped a hare and slender foot.
Whose shape upon the earth did seem
Like a new snow-flake, light and sweet,
And there, from sunlight and jewels,
Like a young spirit fresh from heaven,
She hovered her slender and graceful form,
And humbly I pressed to be forgiven.

O, God, if such a needful as these Near daily money from Thy throne—
If she upon her bended knee—
Our interview and our present one—
She, with her face so clear and bright
We deem her some stray child of light—
If she, with tears soft eyes to me,
Day after day in her first rest,
Must kneel and plead for pardon from Thee,
For what, for deeper need have we?
How hastily, if she should die before,
Will our wild errors be forgiven.

THE HIBERNIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS,

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

THE SECOND NIGHT.

The Captive of Killeshin.—(Continued.)

"Rory Boy," said O'Nolan, "I do thee I entrust the care of this wounded gentleman and the command of these twelve gallowglass. Bear him to the priory of Killeshin, with my instructions to the chief almoner that he want for no attendance or fit medicine. Lysagh Moyle, this holy hermit will accompany you; he doubtless is safe-conduct to Killeshin, and will aid the sick gentleman in interpreting his wants. On your life see that he comes by no harm in your hands, and charge the same strictly upon the Gallowglass. Good night. Take thou this scarf for the lady Una; call her I plucked it from the shoulder of a Saxon warrior in the fight this morning, and send it to her for a token that I have not forgotten her in her sorrow. But we have already wasted too much time. Farewell, Sir Robert, look to your charge, Rory MacRanall. Now, my children, mount, and ride for Ard, Nahoe." So saying, O'Nolan departed with one body of his men, while the remainder proceeded with their charge through the woods, in an opposite direction.

Slish and fair, Fris Thomas could mark nothing but the shining shoulder or receding foliage overhead, as he lay supine upon his litter; but the potion he had taken soon weighed down his eyes in total inconsciousness, and all seemed a blank till he awakened alone in a strange apartment, with a dull pain burning by the head of the couch on which he lay, and an illuminated breviary open on a neal beside.

He attempted to raise his head, to convince himself that it was not a dream; but the stiffness and pain of his arm reminded him of the strange events of the last day, and the throbbing of the head, temples, and parching heat of his body, told too plainly that fever was about to be added to the pain of his wounded limb. Soon, were ringing in his ears which he at first thought voices of some carthereal birds. They then seemed to be but the chiming in his own brain. Again they rose audibly from without. Fris Thomas listened with breathless attention. Now sinking and almost painful sweetness, now sinking and floating away in murmured music, hardly to be distinguished from the sighing of a night breeze; then, again, drawing the very soul of the listener in the ringing harmony of mingled as they rose to a swell of intoxication most powerfully touching.

Fris Thomas listened in doubt, say, almost in terror; for the sudden and unusual sense might have admitted alarm in the most courageous. Wounded, fevered, alone, he knew not where, at the dead of night, approached by sounds of almost unearthly solemnity and mournfulness, he had been fearfully fast, and his eyes began to wander as he looked with momentary expectation of some equally strange sight. Sometimes down the narrow vaulted passage, through which a half-drawn curtain gave the view of a heavy door at the farther end. Beyond, there seemed to be a large apartment; for the sounds came low and solemn, and echoed from the arched roof—as the chanters, he thought, entered from the distance. Shortly the light appeared more intense through the crevices of the door, and soon after a gentle push from some one in possession, opened it far enough partially to display—he scarce knew what.

Fris Thomas beheld a portion of the interior of a church, the richness and splendor of which struck him with a sense of awe and solemnity he had never felt before. The admission then brought in a crowd of worshippers, but a silver censer swinging across the fore-ground of that part of the church hidden from within some angle of the wall, showed that it was the censer of solemn religious ceremony. Presently a bier was borne past on the shoulders of wildly attired men. Monks followed with a mullitude of lepers. Then came female mourners, with disheveled hair, singing the dirge. It died away at length, and in its place arose the voice of one young damsel, chanting what seemed to Fris Thomas, from the few words that he occasionally caught, to be the sacrifice of the dead. That was succeeded by a voice more animated, as of one pronouncing a funeral oration; but the language was unknown to the listener. The emotions of the speaker were, however, so strongly expressed, that the character of the mingled lament and panegyric, with all its gesticulate appeals and tender eulogiums, seemed full of meaning.

When this had ceased, there was a stir among those without, and a loud summons to be opened down the nave of the church for the approach of some one of superior rank. At the same moment, the door, through which the noise had been till now but partially visible, was thrown back as the bier pressed to the wall, and gave to the view of Fris Thomas the whole of the eastern end of the church, with its high altar glittering over the heads of the people in the light of innumerable tapers. On the raised platform immediately in front, lay the corpse of a young man, the rigid white features painfully distinct against the shadow of the incense. Ecclesiastics stood round in issued vestments that shrouded dazzlingly in the light of every taper, and at the end of the nave the crowd beneath made room for the entrance of a tall and majestic form, which Fris Thomas knew, from the description of Lysagh Moyle, must be that of the chief of Leinster. Behind him followed the lady Una, with her face so hid and her person concealed in her mantle, that Fris Thomas could only guess at her identity from the circumstance of her following close in the train of the chief.

"Noca," replied Fris Thomas "the sentence is not more unmitigated in tyranny on the lowest of his slaves, than does the feudal baron over his ward. I have neither father nor mother nor protector to apply to. I have been watched and guarded like a felon, lest I should throw myself at the feet of the king when in England; but here I have no redress, unless I should go a supplicant to my proud kinsmen of Desmond, who disclaimed and disowned my father for marrying as he did, the daughter of O'Maley, and I would rather die than insult the memory of my mother!"

"And was thy mother, then, a Scot?" said the fair Irish woman, her eyes beaming with an interest hitherto unexpressed.

"A true, Scot lady, of the best blood of Connaught," added Fris Thomas, "and but that I was born upon the seas, and educated in England, I would myself be half an Irishman."

"I was also educated among the English of Dublin," said the lady, "yet I am not the less an Irish woman on that account; their language I use for my pleasure; it is not my pleasure to use their government nor laws." Her countenance kindled as she spoke, and Fris Thomas thought he had never seen any being so nobly beautiful before.

"Would to heaven," he exclaimed, "that these dissensions which keep us from knowing one another were at an end! Lady, if the days of waging a vain war against the king of England, you would abide by the surrender of the realm made by your uncle Cadros and confirmed by the Church, what a happy people might the Irish be! We should hear no more of clannish feuds, of barbarous manners, of princes murdered by their usurping successors, or of a nation shut up in ignorance as to a nation which the people of England now allege against their country, as an excuse for whatever severity in the oppression they may choose to practice upon its ill-fated inhabitants."

The lady's eyes flashed an insufferable light of indignation on the redeeming and downcast countenance of Fris Thomas, as he fell, ere he had finished, the injustice of which he had said; yet he could hardly believe that to be wrong which he had been habituated to hear from one and all of the wisest of his youth's companions or acquaintances.

"Thou a son of O'Malley!" she exclaimed, "thou had an Irishman's heart, and done foul wrong to my lost Ever, to say that thou wert like him! In form, in features, you bear the semblance of my noble brother; and I might for a moment shudder to behold you standing before me for the lamenting dead; but never did our brave boy's countenance glow as thine, save with righteous anger against wrong or injustice. I am but a simple maiden, nursed in the annals of other nations, and know not, as a woman, what or where to do to your own histories. I would I were an oilaun, or a bard, to make thee blush for thine own country's degradations; but this I cannot do. I can only bear witness with my tears to the holy indignation that my pearl is burning within me when I hear these specious sophistries of sordid, rapacious men, blind to everything but their own gain, and scrupulous only under the oppression of saxon tyranny, so hateful that death itself would, be confessed, be a happy alternative! Oh, sir, these reproaches have made me forget myself; have made me a traitorous to my grief, and I fear also, to my modesty. I have been here too long—I came to mourn in secret, and I have spent my time in idle, if not in unbecoming converse with a stranger—but the spirit of my brother seemed to inspire me with words which he would have laid down his life to see forgive his sister if she had in aught been the instrument of her education. Farewell."

She passed him, and ere he could find language to entreat her stay, had disappeared round the angle of the wall. Fris Thomas stood like a man dazzled by lightning. "She is a noble being!" was his first exclamation; "she is a noble being!" was his second. Surely I cannot have offended her! I fear—I fear—I have; nay, she cannot but be offended—she certainly left me in displeasure. Yet why should she expect other sentiments than those which she knows to be an Englishman? Ah! but she knows that my mother was of her own country, and that my uncle's tyranny has disgusted me with his whole nation. What could she have spoken as she did without some other motive? I would I could believe this. Is it possible that she could have had no interest in me—I must still be raving from fever! Still, would she, could she, have been so easy in her departure, so easily reconciled to the loss of my society, if she had felt the slightest interest in my welfare? Oh, sir, these reproaches have made me forget myself; have made me a traitorous to my grief, and I fear also, to my modesty. I have been here too long—I came to mourn in secret, and I have spent my time in idle, if not in unbecoming converse with a stranger—but the spirit of my brother seemed to inspire me with words which he would have laid down his life to see forgive his sister if she had in aught been the instrument of her education. Industrial Condition of the Slope.

The California orange in the San Francisco market have hitherto nearly all come from Los Angeles, but now Solano, Butte and Sutter begin to send contributions. One lot of 1,200 was received last week from Putah Creek. One tree in Marysville produced 600 oranges, and all the trees old enough to bear in that town have borne good crops. Though north of latitude 39 degrees, neither fruit nor trees have been injured by the cold. The Appeal says the seedlings are preferred to the budded trees, about Marysville. The seedling is larger and handsomer, and the fruit has a thinner and smoother rind. The orange tree is growing in favor in the Sacramento Valley, for ornament as well as utility.

The total production of wine and brandy of the State in 1872 is estimated by J. M. Curtis at 3,000,000 gallons, equivalent in alcoholic strength to 4,000,000 gallons of dry wine. His information tell him that the yield of Sonoma was in 1872, 45 per cent. less than in 1871; of Napa and Amador, 40 per cent.; of Anaheim, 50 per cent.; of Tuolomne, 30 per cent. and of El Dorado and Yuba 10 per cent. less, while in Yolo it was the same, and in the city of Los Angeles 10 per cent. greater. From these figures he places a total production of 3,000,000 gallons, which we think too low. Less than half the dry wine made in the State is of marketable quality, according to Mr. Curtis.

The Alvarado Beet Sugar Company has made arrangements for next year's planting, which will cover about 200 acres of its own land and 600 acres belonging to farmers in the vicinity. The company undertakes to pay a minimum price for good beets, delivered. The yield near Alvarado ranges from 16 to 20 tons, and the average about 18 tons. The acres planted in 1873 will be about 10 per cent. greater than in 1872. The yield of last year was 2,000 tons, and one half of it has been worked up, and the beets on hand will keep the mill going until March. The pulp is used while wet for feeding 850 oxen, intended for the San Francisco market.

It is reported that the Federal Fish Commission is making preparation to hatch some white fish and more shad, for California. We trust that the mistake of putting all the young fish intended for California in the Sacramento River, will not be repeated. On account of the mud poured into that stream from against the year, by hydraulic mining, it is less favorable for the growth and increase of fish than the San Joaquin, Russian or Sonoma rivers. J. A. Poppe, of Sonoma, succeeded last summer, in bringing half a dozen carp from Germany, and they have grown from six to fourteen inches in length in the last five months, in his ponds. The carp is one of the finest table fishes of Europe, and now, we believe, makes his first appearance in the New World.

The Alta White Lead Works at Visitacion Valley, six miles south of the City Hall, has commenced the production of white lead, ground in linseed oil. The metallic lead is granulated, converted, with the addition of nitric acid, into nitrate of lead, dissolved in water, to which a solution of carbonate of soda is added, whereupon an insoluble carbonate of lead (white lead) is precipitated and the solution of nitrate of soda is drawn off. The wet white lead is washed clean; carried by machinery to a drying room, and then to a mill where it is ground with oil. The metallic lead is now converted in a minute in earthenware pipes, invented by F. Victer, the Superintendent, and the drying apparatus was invented by Dr. O. Rempp, his successor. The nitric acid is recovered from the soda on the premises, and it is claimed that this is the only white lead factory where no acid is lost and no dry white lead mixed by hand. Long-continued exposure of the workmen to fumes, often giving fatal colic.

A company has been incorporated for the establishment of a silk factory in this city, under the management of the Gauthier Brothers and Vinsay, who, though they have only two looms, have woven six hundred yards of fine silk taffeta and velvet in the city. Mr. Gauthier-Gauthier have furnished to us an estimate of the expense of a factory in San Francisco to contain 100 looms. The following are the items: Looms, building, 270x50 feet, three stories high, with chimney and ground, $30,000; 80-horse power steam engine, $7,500; boiler, $2,000; silk-throwing machines, $1,736; dyeing machinery, $1,500; reels, $1,570; warping frames, $775; spooling frames, $1,000; 100 looms, $10,000; silk, $100,000; cards, $4,753; machine shop, $1,500; sundry and tools, $1,000; working capital, $30,000; total, $193,834. Adding ten machinery, $1,200, and cost of building and machinery, $69,166, the total cost of establishing and equipping 100 looms in full operation are thus estimated. The engine, organized for work, would consume 30 tons of coal per month, at $6 per ton, $180; oil, $75; waste, $25; repairs of boiler and engine, $75; repairs of machinery, $75; engineer, $100; fireman, $75; 2 dyers, $200; 2 throwsters, $200; 2 overseers, $200; insurance, taxes, etc., $11,766; wear any consequence, $6,000; total expenses, $18,146. The estimated annual product is 150,000 yards of basic taffeta and velvet, which can probably be sold by wholesale at 95 25 per yard, $237,500, leaving $94,000 to cover interest and profit. Manufactured silk is duty free, a duty of 60 per cent. by the Austrian tariff; raw silk is free. The place to import the best French raw silk is Hong Kong here about $9 per lb., and wave it into the qualities of silk stuffs.

There are now three establishments for the production of artificial stone in California—that for Frear stone, another for Bay Shore stone, and a third for artificial marble. The artificial stone is made of ground sandy to Oakland, produces a hard, durable stone, susceptible of fine polish, and but little is injury by the touch of acids. Any color can be given to it. It is hardened by baking in an oven at a temperature of 400°. Floor tiles, table tops and moulded stone ornaments will be among its products. The process is a new American discovery. The material is unknown to many people who might like to use the artificial marble, which, however, formerly sent no name to mine, has now 110 stamps at work, and is turning out large quantities of rock daily. The mine has been opened so far that a supply of good auriferous quartz, estimated to be sufficient for two years' work, is in sight. No other gold mine in the State can compare with this one for steadiness of production and certainty of a large yield of bullion. The years' work for 100 stamps is at least 300,000 tons. The Idaho mine has 1 stamps and $5,000 per day. The last report from the Eureka, of Grass Valley, is $2,000 per day. The Nevada Transcript of the 15th says:

"The Mazeppa claims, situated a short distance north of town, owned by Roberts & Co., having completed their powder drift of 30 feet, and run their 7'0 of 60 feet each way from the head of the drift, yesterday afternoon let off a blast of 6,566 pounds of powder, or 204 kegs. The ground was shattered and broken up for a considerable distance, and millions of tons of gravel are now broken up, ready to yield its golden treasures as soon as washing commences. We understand that on Monday next a thousand inches of water is to be turned loose in the gravel bank, under a pressure of over 200 feet, and the way gravel will disappear will have to be seen to be appreciated."

Rumor says a new mine of rich tin ore has been discovered twelve miles southeast of the town of San Bernardino.—Alta.

Rev. Edward Burns died suddenly on the 26th of December, at his residence, St. Augustine, Cambria county, Pa., in the 57th year of his age. He was buried from the Cathedral, Pittsburgh.

Prussia contains nearly 10,000,000 Catholics. The greater portion of these are in the Eastern Provinces—Pomerania, Posen, Silesia and that Prussia—and these are the provinces which send the most representatives to the House of Lords.

Rev. P. E. Doyle, Pastor of St. Peter's Church, Washington, and one of the most prominent Catholic clergymen in the city, was severely injured lately by falling on the ice, and is under treatment to the hospital.

St. Mary's, Albany, N. Y., congregation subscribed $900 in three days towards paying off the debt on that church. The same congregation paid off over $100,000 of that debt in three years. Truly noble and generous parish!

The 8th of December, the anniversary of Archbishop Hughes's death, St. Mary Mass was celebrated at the Cathedral, New York city, for the repose of his soul. A very large number of priests were present on the occasion.

Another great niece of the Pope, Donna Maria Pia Mastai, took the veil in the convent of the Tor de'Specchi, where so many noble Roman spinsters follow the rule of Santa Francesca Romana. The ceremony was most impressive, like the passage of a bride, but being near relatives of the youthful nun.

On Wednesday, New Year's Day, Sister Gregory Bernard (Mary McDermott), Sister Joseph Bernard (Annie Cosse), Sister Christine (Mary Agnes O'Brien), and Sister Winifred Seward (Margaret Furlong), received the Black veil, having made the vows of religion in the Order of the Sisters of Mercy, in the Community Chapel, Providence, R. I. The Right Rev. Dr. Hendricken performed the ceremony.

At Gori, on Tuesday, November 26th, the solemn reception of two young ladies into the Order of Mercy took place. The young ladies who were received were Miss Mary Teresa Kelly (in religion Sister Mary Magdalen de Pazzi), daughter of Patrick Kelley, Esq., Edenderry; and Miss Margaret, of Gallowstown, Roscrea, (in religion Sister Mary Catherine). The imposing ceremony took place in the Convent Chapel, and the Most Rev. Dr. McEvily, Bishop of Galway, officiated.

On the 16th of January, at the Dominican Convent of St. Catherine of Sienna, near Springfield, Ky., six young ladies received their white veil. The following are the names of the young ladies: Miss Margaret Hagin, in religion Sister Mary Gertrude; Miss Mary Ryan (Sister Columbe); Miss Sally Hunt (Sister Agnes); Miss Katie Hunt (Sister Catherine Josephine); Miss Langen (Sister Dominica); Miss Kate Coughlin (Sister Mary Lawrence) of New York City, and Mary Cassidy (Sister Stephens), of Dubuque, Iowa.

On Thursday, December 26th, Right Rev. Bishop Domenec visited St. Vincent's Monastery, diocese of Pittsburg. On Thursday and Friday he gave Subdeaconship and Deaconship to Rev. Joseph Gallagher, Michael Meagher, Ambrose Fuhrer, O. S. B., Raymond Daniel, O. S. B., Theodore Goth, O. S. B., Leo Horid, O. S. B., Benedict Mangold, O. S. B., and H. Gudman, O. S. B. On Saturday he raised to the dignity of the holy Priesthood the six last named reverend gentlemen, belonging to the Order of St. Benedict. The ceremonies were very imposing, owing to the great number of the Fathers, with their venerable Abbot, who assed them.

Japan Adopting European Customs.

The changes in the social customs of Japan, proclaimed by Government edict, have been numerous and startling. The first Imperial order is that henceforth the Japanese Government is to be harmonized with foreign chronology. The 25th of December (Christmas Day) is henceforth to be held sacred to the memory of Zemu Tenno—the first Emperor of Japan.

Japanese officials of rank are now required to wear an European official costume, and to attend weekly levées, to be held by the Mikado on and after New Year's Day. His Majesty has so far altered his mode of life as to receive guests at dinner every alternate day. His wife is served and dressed in foreign style; politics are talked of as a subject for conversation, for which the ordinary topics of the day are expected to suffice.

Divorce is abolished, and the free-and-easy style of coupling and separation, analogous in all respects to what Free-Lovers in this country would introduce in America, is to be known no more. Hereafter the marriage tie is to be binding, and it is said that formal papers will be permitted to legally espouse the daughters of Japan.

Lesbianism is also checked. There is to be no more loafing by laborers on wet days, nor any holidays or wakes prescribed by law. Instead, a brisk mate with which house doors are covered there are believed to induce lounging, they are to be done away with, to prevent sleeping at midday. The hair of both men and women must be cut under severe penalty, the former are to part with their top-knots—if not voluntarily, by the shears of the police—and to wear their beards in European style. The latter are henceforth to dispense with their female hair-dressers, and do their own hair. By way of concession for the loss of their cherished queue, the men are told that they can shave a portion of the saved time and barber fees to improve their education. The barbers especially object, and have acted in a body on the Governor of Nagasaki, who has been requested to settle the perruquiers with the same result as befel the perruquiers in the famous petition George III. drew forth a burlesque address from the artificial limb-makers, praying his Majesty to wear a wooden leg for the encouragement of trade.

Notice has been given to soldiers and wrestlers that they will be allowed to continue their profession for the next three years only. Dating from this month, and in the meantime they are expected to learn some more honorable method of gaining a livelihood.

Our Bodily Infirmities.

Physical infirmities are the lot of all. Millions are always sick. No man, woman or child is uniformly in perfect health. Most, however, of the sickness and suffering which render life a burden to so many of our fellow beings is due to carelessness and neglect in a slightly attack to look after the cause of disease has been provided. It is as ruinous as it is effective. No poisonous drug enters into its composition. It is an undefiled ethereal, tonic and specific, of which every ingredient is vegetable. This unexceptionable preventive and restorative medicine is not "a new thing under the sun." Hostetter's Stomach Bitters will soon have been before the world a quarter of a century; and it is not too much to say that its sales are, now, ten of thousands times greater than it would have been in their infancy, if it had not been generally acknowledged by the wholesome and beneficial effects which it has produced in the bodily infirmities of those who, before its use, were unable to work, or even to walk. Dyspepsia, biliousness, nervousness, rheumatism, kidney complaint, debility, constipation, malarious fevers, chronic diseases of the liver, and all disorders of the stomach, bowels and blood, yield to the influence of this vegetable corrective. To this list of ailments, which are the most frequent and most distressing of those which afflict humanity, it is indeed a blessing to mankind that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters are every where prescribed, and every where popular.

Industrial Condition of the Slope.

The California oranges in the San Francisco market have hitherto nearly all come from Los Angeles, but now Solano, Butte and Sutter begin to send contributions. One lot of 1,200 was received last week from Potah Creek. One tree in Marysville produced 600 oranges, and all the trees old enough to bear in that town have borne good crops. Though north of latitude 39 degrees, neither fruit nor trees have been injured by the frost. The Appeal says the seedlings are preferred to the budded trees, about Marysville. The seedling is larger and handsomer, and the fruit has a thinner and smoother rind. The orange tree is growing in favor in the Sacramento Valley, for ornament as well as utility.

The total production of wine and brandy of the State in 1872 is estimated by J. M. Curtis at 3,000,000 gallons, equivalent in alcoholic strength to 4,000,000 gallons of dry wine. His informants tell him that the yield of Sonoma was in 1872, 45 per cent. less than in 1871; of Napa and Amador, 40 per cent.; of Anaheim, 50 per cent.; of Tuolumne, 30 per cent. and of El Dorado and Yuba 10 per cent. less, while in Yolo it was the same, and in the city of Los Angeles 10 per cent. greater. From these figures he has a total loss in product of 3,000,000 gallons, which we think too low. Less than half the dry wine made in the State is of marketable quality, according to Mr. Curtis.

The Alvarado Beet Sugar Company has made arrangements for next year's planting, which will cover about 200 acres of land, own land and 400 acres belonging to farmers in the vicinity. The company undertakes to pay manufacturers $4 50 per ton for good beets, delivered. The yield per A'varado ranges from 10 to 20 tons, and the average about 15 tons. The area planted in 1872 will be about 10 per cent. greater than in 1873. The yield of last year was 1,800 tons, and one-half of it has been worked up, and the beets on hand will help to make the yield of May 1st. About 2,000 tons will be used while the feeding season lasts, which is the principal time for the manufacture of silk cloth.

There are now three establishments for the production of artificial stone in California—one for the Franz stone, another for the Raccone stone, and a third for artificial marble. The artificial marble factory is in Oakland, produces a hard, compact stone, capable of high polish, and not liable to injury by the touch of acids. Any color can be given to it. It is hardened by baking in an oven at a temperature of 200°. Floor tiles, table tops, and moulded stone ornaments will be among the products. The process is a new American discovery, and its merits are unknown to many people who might like to use the artificial marble.

The Sierra Butte, formerly the Nonpareil, has run 118 stamps for a week, and is turning out large quantities of bullion. The mines have been opened so far that a supply of auriferous quartz, estimated to be sufficient for ten years' work, is in sight. No other gold mine in the State can compare with this one for steadiness of production or the certainty of a long continued profit. The years' work for 100 stamps is at least 300,000 tons. The Idaho mine has yielded nearly $3,000 per day, and by a report from the Secretary of Grass Valley, is $2,900 per day. The Nevada Transcript of the 18th says:

The Alta White Lead Works at Visitacion Valley, six miles south of the City Hall, has commenced the production of white lead, ground in linseed oil. The metallic lead is granulated, converted, with the addition of nitric acid, into nitrate of lead, dissolved in water, to which a solution of carbonate of soda is added, whereupon an insoluble carbonate of lead (white lead) is precipitated and the solution of nitrate of soda is drawn off. The wet white lead is washed clean, carried by machinery to a drying-room, and then to a mill where it is ground with oil. The metallic lead is now supplied to a nitrate in manufactory pipes, invented by F. Vieter, the Superintendent, and the drying apparatus is the invention of C. C. Rose, of Alameda. The nitric soda is recovered from the soda on the precipitation, and it is claimed that this is the only white lead factory where no acid is lost and no dry white lead moved by hand. Large purifiers for handling of the dust is dangerous, often giving lead colic.

A company has been incorporated for the establishment of a silk factory in this city, under the management of the Gunther Brothers and Valery, who, though they have only two looms, have woven six handsome pieces of fine silk for themselves and friends in this city. Messrs. Gunther have furnished to us an estimate of the expense of a factory in San Francisco to contain 100 looms. The following are the items:

Wooden building, 270x30 feet, three stories high, with chimney and ground, $20,000; 60-horse power steam engine, $7,500; boiler, 60-horse power steam engine, $7,500; boiler, $2,000; silk-throwing machines, $7,750; dyeing machinery, $1,500; reels, $1,570; warping frames, $775; winding frames, $1,000; finishing machinery, $10,000; cutting and finishing machinery, $4,750; looms, 100, $15,000; horse and wagon, $600; sizing up machinery, $1,500, total cost of building and machinery, $91,000. The annual expenses and receipts when in full operation are thus estimated: Interest on investment at 10 per cent., $9,2,800; 7,970 lbs. of frame for filling, $24,600; wages for 300 workmen, $73,000; salaries of superintendent, book-keeper, correspondent, etc., $6,000; coal, gas, dye-stuffs, insurance, repairs, etc., $11,000; wear and tear of machinery, $5,000. Total annual expense, $243,500. The estimated annual product, 318,000 yards of black silk—three silk—ready for saleable here by wholesale at $2 25 per yard, $357,750, leaving $94,000 to cover interest and profit. Manufactured silk is subject to a duty of 60 per cent. of the ad valorem tariff on raw silk free. The plan is to import the best French raw silk, costing here about 22 per cent. more, and the best dyes, and to work up in the finest manner the qualities of silk cloth.

There are now three establishments for the production of artificial stone in California—one for the Franz stone, another for the Raccone stone, and a third for artificial marble factory. The artificial marble factory, opened lately in Oakland, produces a hard, compact stone, capable of high polish, and not liable to injury by the touch of acids. Any color can be given to it. ### The Ancient Churches of Kilkenny.

A lecture on "The Ancient Churches of Kilkenny" was delivered at the rooms of the Young Men's Society, Kilkenny, on Sunday, December 15th, by John Hogan, Esq. A large and fashionable audience was present, who listened with rapt attention to the eloquent lecturer's description of the origin and history of the many ancient churches of the above named city, including St. Canice's, St. Patrick's and St. Mary's; together with the Black Abbey and other churches of historic interest in the Marble City. The following is a short extract concerning St. Canice's Church (now in possession of the Protestant community) from the lengthy lecture: After the death of Feradach Finn (852), Colman, his son, took possession of the Government of Ossory, when the native race rose in rebellion against his rule, and claimed for Donough of Magh Roighna the kingship of Ossory. Two chieftains, named Maelgrabh and Maeludhar, became leaders of the insurrection, and followed by a great multitude, they besieged the Castle of Colman, and set it on fire. St. Kenny (or Canice), having had timely intimation of the popular designs, hastened from the monastery at Aghaboe to the rescue of his royal protégé, and as he traveled on his way "through the plain of the kingdom" he met Donough of Magh Roighna, the enemy and rival of Colman, who addressed the Saint in a haughty manner, thus, "I know you are hastening to liberate your friend Colman, but it is all to no use, as you shall find, for but it is all to no use, as you shall find, for so corpse mingled and consumed by fire," to which the Saint made answer: "The fire of the Virgin knows that matters are otherwise than you state, and as punishment for your falsehood, you yourself shall die before your sister, your house," a prediction that was soon fulfilled. Having thus dispersed Colman's rival, St. Kenny, in his chariot, came quickly to the fortress of the king, which was surrounded by a great multitude on all sides, and which had been given up to the flames, St. Kenny entering into the fortress amidst the burning flames, by the power of the Lord, and without any one seeing or knowing him, brought forth from his perilous position, through the midst of the armed multitude, and leading him to a distance, from the Castle said to him, "Wait here, although you are alone to-day, you shall not be so ever more, for at first there was a shall come to you in this place, and afterwards three hundred, and on the third day you shall be King of all Ossory." This prediction was fully verified, as Colman reigned for nearly the following twenty years. He died in the year 601. Colman's fortress occupied the site of the present Castle of Kilkenny. Can it be doubted that as a thank-offering for his deliverance, and in gratitude to the benefactor of his house, the Saint built the lands of the Church which have since preserved the name of St. Kenny (Canice) to be bodily at work? The Church we find thence downwards indiscriminately termed Kilkenny and Ossory, and the Bishop of this diocese, the Bishop of Kilkenny and the Bishop of Ossory.

A "Long Course" of the Two Gallery.

Let me say, then, in a milder strain that the opera gallery is a little world, or at least a little Ireland. All the brogues are there; per-aphitting Kerry, shrill Donegal, Caledonian Antrim, rich Tipperary, Connaught, melodious Clare, and Cork, dialing inimitable over all the rest like a factory chimney over cottages. There, too, are all the accents, from the "hep, step and leap," in vogue with Limerick men, to the peculiar whine of Connaught, uttered by a young Dublin. The cad is jostled by the boor, and the swell by the plasterer. The lad of fifty, or far from manhood as the tadpole is to a frog, puts his elbow in the rib of his donkey-boy, and a Moss city man is as much used up as Sir Charles Coldstream was before he turned head and ran away. Here the tone so loved and purring. The Trinity freshman, the sweep, the medical cad, the private soldier, the man who lives on his income, the idler who is as the opera bonnet he finds no "fun" outside it, the brave lover of sweet sounds, who is thrilled by the touch of Mozart as the war-horse by the sound of a trumpet, the Bohemian who sups everywhere, the poor enthusiast and the more dull soul who pays his shilling because no money others do the same, and knows no more why the opera pleases nor why the band is there or knows why he is chosen for a funeral—all these various kinds of people, and a great many others, admit to being believingly as gods. They are the Arabs of the city desert, who come suddenly trooping to the oasis, and in dreary baroness. They let open their flannels to Dollymount in the roaring morning drive to the Strawberry Beds under they pell against each other in the regatta; they swarm to Baldoyle when Punchestown and when they locks them up in town, they play billiards, lounge over bars, and sit down and down the stairs and dream their art-pantomime between high tragedy at the Queen's, middle tragedy at the Royal, and sweet tragedy at the Gaiety, and the law allows them in the music halls.—"The Opera Gods," in the Dublin Evening Mail.

Important Discovery of a Tumba de Beaux Skeleton at Cong.

Mr. E. Maguire writes to the Galway Advertiser: A few days ago, having been informed that a human skeleton was deposited in a vault in Ballykine Upper, within a mile of Cong, on the property of Sir A. R. Guinness, I proceeded to examine the said vault. On raising a large flag cover-ing a vault, in the center of a cairn thirty-two yards in circumference, a full-grown human skeleton was discovered, placed in such a position that I inferred that the body was interred in the sitting posture with the face turned to the west. Fortunately, Sir William Wilde, the great authority in all archæological researches in Ireland, was staying at Moytura, and without touching a bone, I sent him word to come to me. Sir William proceeded with me at once to the cairn, corroborated my supposition as to the manner of burial, and by this and by the curious conformation of the skull, identified the remains as those of a Tumba de Beaux, in all probability a chieftain who had fled away from the West against that of the Firbolgs, as the famous battle of Moytura, fully described by Sir William in his "Lough Corrib," and fought seven hundred years before the Christian era. An empty vault was found near the remains; and Sir William thinks that very probably contained jewelry or other treasure, deposited with the departed chieftain. The latter says that his vault was rifled about four years ago by a person whose relations still live in the neighborhood.

Singular Conduct of a Priest.

A gallant act of heroism is related by a correspondent of the Cork Examiner. Sir lade west out on the 16th inst., in spite of an exceedingly heavy rain-storm, to hunt in the neighborhood of the Foils, a river almost exclusively fed by mountain torrents, near Abbey-feale, in the wildest part of Limerick county. Forgeting their position in the excitement of their amusement, they were surprised by the rapid rise of the poor lads to a sense of their danger, to find themselves surrounded by a sea of water. Escape seemed impossible. Before them lay the Feale, surging in its rage, behind and around them rose the dark unsightly crests, from every glen and ravine of which dashed torrents of water, increasing every moment, boiling, roaring, swelling, overflowing their banks, and spreading destruction all around. News reached Abbeyfeale; the people flocked out in hundreds, terror depicted in every face. The Royal Irish were there, but were powerless to affect anything towards rescuing the poor fellows. In this emergency, news reached the Rev. W. Casey, who was about breaking his fast after officiating in the church. In an instant that generous soul, and though of a consultition not the strongest, rushed to the scene, and regardless of his own safety, and indifferent to the pelting storm of rain and sleet which was blinding him at every step, dashed into the flood, accompanied by one solitary companion, whose name did not transpire, and after an hour's unremitting efforts and many hair-breadth escapes, succeeded in rescuing, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, the six foolhardy young lads, whom he restored to their parents wiser, if not better boys.

A Touch of Nature.

The human oboe was the fixed star of the season, but one night its radiance paled in the sudden blaze of a meteor. In a pale young boy, with a face of feminine delicacy, and long fair hair, that was parted like a girl's, had been sitting close beside me in the stalls, and gazing on the scene so ingly about him with great black eyes that realised to mine Art's dream in the Sistine Chapel. In the course of a moment, this boy began to sing in a voice as like a girl's as his face. The song had the simplicity of childhood, the sweet tenderness of his uplifted eyes: "My Mary of the Curling Hair." The first line was warbled it, and no other sound was heard. The "wailoping" ditties of the evening before and of Signor Oboe were left out of mind with himself. When the sweet love song was over, and the tide of the silence dropped, restraint and wonder burst forth in a grand hurricane of applause. A flash of pride made the boy's bright face brighter still, and the pale cheek as red as a summer rose. Wellington was far less happy the night after Waterloo than this boy in his first triumph among the gods. Ambition had then long since wilted region cone; it scanned the gallery keenly many a night, but never saw him after.—Fun Poor Gods," in the Dublin Illustrated Annual.

The Leinster Leases.

The Catholic clergy in the county of Kildare, who acted so boldly as the champion of the tenants of the Duke of Leinster in the late controversy respecting the "Leinster leases," were not unmindful of their duty to their flocks. The triumph is now with the reverend gentlemen who so earnestly advocated justice. Lord John Fitzgerald, the duke's son, has in a public letter denounced the lease in question as being a harsh and indefensible. The Duke of Leinster is very far advanced in a life which has been spent principally at home in Ireland among his tenants, and all regretted that his blind old age he departed from a course of action which long made him popular. As his own son has now taken the side of the aggrieved tenantry, the very reason to hope that the fund on the estates of his grace will soon be at an end.—Universe.

ENGLAND.

English Justice.

From time to time the English papers try to throw dust upon the administration of justice in America. If they were greater England is not the land which can afford to reproach another. The following statement, made by Mr. Vernon Harcourt, M. P., is a remarkable illustration of the manner in which modern Israel "strains at a gnat and swallows a camel." "Under the Act of Queen Elizabeth, 'for the maintenance of the Queen's true lover of arms and sounds, who is thrilled by the touch of Mozart as the war-horse by the sound of a trumpet, the Bohemian who sups everywhere, the poor enthusiast and the more dull soul who pays his shilling because no money others do the same, and knows no more why the opera pleases nor why the band is there or knows why he is chosen for a funeral—all these various kinds of people, and a great many others, admit to being believingly as gods. ### The "Popish" Bugbear.

Some peculiar people of Edinburgh seem determined that Mr. Newdegate shall not lack joy, alone, visions of Jesuits in the air and monks in everything; and they, in public meeting assembled, have been cross-questioning Messrs. Duncan McLaren and John Miller, the parliamentary representatives of that city, with reference to "the military organization of the League of St. Salvatian." Mr. McLaren very bluntly declared that he would not read all the pamphlets and long letters written to prove that the League deserved punishment by anticipation, as he objects "to all that kind of thing!" though he expressed his readiness to give honest answers to simple questions. Mr. Miller spoiled a letter, the writer of which stated that if the operations of the League of St. Salvatain were not "stopped" they would bring about a massacre of far greater extent than that of St. Bartholomew." A Mr. Johnstone, who had distinguished himself by the compilation of the extraordinary missive from which the words were quoted, was strictly non-committal in his interpretation. The honorable member proceeded to show, we trust to the satisfaction of the parsimonious, that the League is not responsible for the desertions from the British army, which amounts to some eight or nine hundred per month.—Catholic Opinion, December 28.

FRANCE.

France and Austria.

We have not yet heard the last of the controversy between M. Thiers and the Duke de Gramont. The correspondent of the Correspondance publishes a letter from the Napoleonist Duke, replying to some of the President's statements in the late Parliamentary discussion. M. Thiers declared, first, that the Prussians were not responsible for the war, and that "it was not we who made it were;" and second, that the Duke de Gramont had been assured by Count Beust and Count Andrassy that if France went to war she must not depend upon Austria for assistance. The former of these statements, says the last Foreign Minister under the Empire, gave surprise to every Cabinet in Europe, and nowhere more than at the Chancellry at Berlin, where such humility or simplicity was not expected from France. As to the second affirmation of M. Thiers, the Duc de Gramont makes the following replies and remarkable avowal that he was authorized at Vienna to say to the Emperor: "Austria regards the cause of France as her own; and will do everything within the limits of possibility to secure to her success of her arms." "That," he writes, "was what I was charged to say to the French Government, and others besides me were entrusted with the same message. I am not quoting from memory. I have his dispatches before me, and I can prove what I have advanced." The Temps doubts the wisdom of the ex-Minister's avowal, since, despite all Austrian assertions, it proves that, before the Hohenzollern candidature had been thought of, Bismarck had been seeking allies against Prussia. To prove that would be to justify the preparations of Germany, and that, forewarned, she was wisely forearmed.

The Lourdes Pilgrimage.

Our readers will remember the outrageous attack made upon the pilgrimage of the Communists of Nantes when passing through that town on their way to Lourdes —that the pilgrims were hooted, pelted, and the mayor and priest grossly insulted, with the manifest connivance of the Mayor and municipal authorities. The matter was then appealed to for protection, told them that they deserved none—why did they come there? When the outrage was brought before the National Assembly, M. Thiers seemed to come into the same view with regard to the matter, and unequivocally espoused the cause of the rioters and their prompters in the Municipal Council. The Assembly went so far as to send him before a court-martial for the charge of insubordination. The case came on, and the court, after hearing the counsel for the defense, declared itself incompetent in the matter. This is the real defeat suffered by the Prussian Government on its own ground, nay, at the hands of its own military tribunal—never has the judicial policy of persecuting the Church received more striking rebuke from the high sectors themselves. In connection with this the Berlin Germania observes: "It is remarkable that the Court has acknowledged that the army bishop's case is a purely ecclesiastical one, and that its verdict authority has nothing whatever to do with it. It is a hard blow dealt out to the new-fangled system of the army of faith Staat that has lately obtained with us, and consequently our Government cannot but feel much at loss how to extricate themselves from the most unexpected difficulty." Let there be no charge raised against the Court, if it evinces the same spirit of independence in dealing with the case of Mgr. Kremenz as the court martial has shown in this matter.—Universe, December 28.

RUSSIA.

Russian Tyranny.

The tyranny of the Russians in Poland has, of late, increased in violence. Hitherto, Poles has not been allowed to acquire real estate in the adjoining provinces of Lithuania, but now this disability is to be extended to the kingdom of Poland itself; so that Russians are to be settled there after the law efforts of the Poles to recover their national independence, in 1863, the Russian tyrants arbitrarily seized the property of the Catholic Church and condemned those of the priests who were not transported into Siberia, to live on a scanty pittance paid to them by the Government. The lands thus stolen in the provinces of Wilna and Portikas are about to be put up for auction, and the confiscation of the last remains of the allen despotism has never dared to devise in any country of Europe, in the 19th century at least; they are much weaker of a Cromwell or William III., than of the "benevolent" and "humane" ruler of all the Russias. No one is to be admitted as a purchaser if he does not either belong to the Greek schismatic Church, or else has been or is a Government official; and to prevent any Catholics from getting a "lot," by some chance, it has been ordered that the intending bidders must produce their own and their parents' certificates of baptism, by which means Rhesia hopes eventually to effect the dispossession, or, as they term it on the Continent, the "expatriation" of the natives in Poland, just as England did in Ireland for upwards of six hundred years. The result will be the same in the former case as it had been in the latter; the invaders will eventually become outcasts in the country of their adoption, and ever remain a nuisance in the sight of God and of their enemies.—Universe, December 28.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Lecture by Monsigner Capel on its Moral and Social Effects.

On Sunday evening, Dec. 29th, Monsigner Capel preached at the Pro-Cathedral, Cliffton, to an overflowing congregation, the subject of his discourse being "The Confessional—its Social and Moral Effects." The text was taken from verse five of the first chapter of the Gospel according to St. John: "And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness did not comprehend it." After a few preliminary observations, the right reverend preacher said his hearers unfortunately must have been brought into contact—through speaking to friends and acquaintances who had read certain books—with serious charges that were brought against the Confessional—against that instrument whereby God Almighty reconciled us to Himself. They had been told, and probably they might have seen very lately, the assertion made that, first of all, the Confessional was delerterious to the purse who lived such confessions; his mind, said the objector, has been polluted by the reading of books so immoral that they could not be placed before the public without bringing upon the publisher of them the punishment worthy of the man. Some objectors went further, and said that this deleterious effect exercised likewise on the pentent's ears, and that an innocent and unpolluted mind became contaminated by the influence of the questions propounded and the conversations that were there carried on. To strengthen his objection, they had recourse to efforts drawn smutty literature of the day. One man was exercised in the matter, and that was a priest who had betrayed to death the mayor and some other citizens of a town during the German war. A German military jury had given a third reading to the bill for the restitution of the property of the Orleans family.——At Lyons the infidels have established a fund for the purpose of purchasing corpses for their dissections. Twenty-five francs is offered as a bribe to the poor who will consent to their disposal after death, and it is said that numerous bodies are buried elsewhere. Two frauds a head will also be given to any person who will assist at the disgusting barbarism. What, nice, refined characters are our modern thrusspensers!—Universe, Dec. 28.

ITALY.

Under Piedmontese Rule.

A "Lugger of St. Sebastian" writes a letter to the Crusader, from which we extract the following. He tells only a more than "thrice told tale" when he describes in effect Piedmontese rule in Naples as worse than no rule at all: "Mr. M., an English gentleman in the trust, sense of the term, and a Protestant to boot, alights from a boat at a point where a landslip has blocked up the road from Sorrento to Castellamare, rendering necessary a slight detour by sea. An exorbitant fare is demanded and resisted, and after a few high words Mr. M. is seized by two carabineers, pinned against the cliff, and forced to submit to the application of thumb-screws, one more brutal carabineer biting his victim's hand severely to force it open. Mr. M. is then incarcerated in the town jail of Castellamare, and detained there nearly two days and a night, the cowardly Prefect calling upon him in the prison, requesting an exchange of cards, and disclaiming all complicity in the affair. An English professional gentleman has lately received an anonymous letter of the most diabolical character, threatening him with the most certain death if within a given time he does not pay a sum of more than two thousand pounds. In England we should take very little notice of such a threat, but here there is something in it, and what is worse, if the writer be detected, one of his associates will most certainly revenge him. All sorts of illegal authorities, and our country-man has quietly packed up everything movable and left the country, to the intense regret and loss of his numerous clientele. Here no man can call anything his own. Thieves rob from the person in the streets in broad daylight, and are not interfered with. The police would be powerless, and are afraid of the thieves, and small blame to them—for a clever arrest of a dangerous character is sure to be followed by the assassination of a policeman. The case came on, and the court, after hearing the counsel for the defence, declared itself incompetent in the matter. This is the real defeat suffered by the Prussian Government on its own ground, nay, at the hands of its own military tribunal—never has the judicial policy of persecuting the Church received more striking rebuke from the high sectors themselves. In connection with this the Berlin Germania observes: "It is remarkable that the Court has acknowledged that the army bishop's case is a purely ecclesiastical one, and that its verdict authority has nothing whatever to do with it. Let there be no charge raised against the Court, if it evinces the same spirit of independence in dealing with the case of Mgr. Kremenz as the court martial has shown in this matter.

A TALE OF IRISH LIFE.

PART II.

What shock their hearts and utterly dispirited them, was the course taken by the bishop and clergy. The deputation from the Council of the Tenant League, on arriving at Athlone, found themselves confronted by an ecclesiastical opposition, with which it was useless to contend. In vain the men who flung themselves into the turmoil and begged the people, by the most solemn aspirations, to remember that, by sending back Crowe to Parliament, they would be sending their own throats, agreed with their wishes. The few priests who took part with the nationalists were speedily cowed by the anathemas of the denied rivals, and even forced to fly for their lives from the religious and bribed of the Solicitor-General's bullies.

Crowe, meanwhile, was prosecuting what he fut called "a glorious and truly successful canvass." "Everywhere," observed his eloquent mercenary, "the Orange leaders have sprung to their feet by a common instinct, resolved to teach the enemies of religion and order a lesson. The denunciations are not to be trifled with by a little knot of journalists desperate and ruined by their own folly. Ireland will be true to herself at this great crisis, and show her opponents that her people are not to be trifled with." Publicans were told to "remember" that the State had arrogated the right of pronouncing in matters of religion, and that it was for them to govern Catholic opinion on Protestant principles, and to banish to the workhouse all who gave adhesion divorced from revelation in religion. He gave politicians to understand, that the Bishop of Ripbin, whose sacred character Ireland cherished the profoundest reverence, had thrown his arms over Crowe, and sent, arm in arm, through the streets with that archpriest, soliciting votes and influence. He looked as if the last vestige of hope were about to disappear from the country. It was indeed a time of terror. Instead of a manly struggle—a battle of giants, in one of which Ireland's champion was to be crowned with victory—the people were to be the passive and ill-conditioned slaves of Fraud and Darkness and the unbending angels of Truth and Light. But there was, in reality, no struggle at all. The people, giving up at his back, the weak and unorganized Nationalist forces were gallantly and ruthlessly cut down. There was nothing up to him; how much their income was to be in the future. He could not say. The choice of bonfires in the streets; and a peaceful town was suddenly converted by the dundle against of mingled revelry and drink into a pandemonium. Every sober man and woman regretted the horrid scene they witnessed, but what could they do to stop it? The firemen was given up to rioting and debauchery. The night was made horrible with the yellings and shrieking of intoxicated wretches who paraded the streets, and rushed to Sadleir and liberty!—"Sadleir and the priests for ever," was the cry of the drunken mob, and the cry of sickening him. The hand was grown more sedate and self-restrained than ever, and so querulous and unhappy when "put out," that few cared to be in his acquaintances cared to draw him into a discussion upon any possible subject. Their advocates in the newspapers spoke of his exclusion from the House as if it were a great misfortune to the country, and as if the Bishops of Lagbilin and Kildare, and of the greater bulk of the clergy, but their linked brethren did not wish to have him represented in the House. Somehow the people failed to recognize the full extent of the misery and wickedness they had assured they suffered. Some of them went, indeed, so far as to say that John Sadleir had deserved well of the country, that if a few more of his friends were treated in the same ungrateful manner the country would be little the worse for repudiating them. Very few persons found fault with the priests. The priests expressed a fear that Sadleir's principles—no matter who ballot—to be left alone, and he was now indulging in one of those sudden fits of quiet before the storm which the specialists in brain disease ever often find associated with the accident. The bell of the little Catholic chapel, close at hand, began to ring for vespers. Every toll went through Sadleir. He remembered another bell, often heard in the green glades of a Tipperary highland on Sunday morning, and its tones to leave home, in order that he might have time to go to the nearest village and get shaved and stiffened by his mother's hands—and be in for the precious privilege of "answering Mass." Happy, innocent days, when he slept without the terrors of evil dreams, and conserved peace and kind-feeling the highest ambition of life! Could he go back to them, he would crush London like a toad under his heel. Could he! Could he get a new heart, and borrow a fresh conscience! Could he shake off his sins like a garment, and forget his iniquities as "the Vision of them that dream, in which there is no substance, and when one awakes the recorded no basis?" No; they clung to him like a vesture of fire. He might bathe in the healing pool, but what angel would descend to quicken its salutary waters? With a loud sob, he crossed his arms before him, and hid his face in the fold of cloth and flesh so formed. The overwhelming horrors of remorse had seized him, and were strangling him in their choking embrace. He felt the perspiration bursting from the pores of his forehead, and began to take heart for a reaction that might end in sleep—sweet sleep!—when he suddenly he heard a prolonged knocking at the street door and then the hurried and violent "Ithibubation" of a bell. "Some of my friends," he muttered, and again endeavored to compose himself.

CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

The revival of Brownson's Review is an event deserving of more notice than that necessitated by the usual criticism. It is a cheering sign of the progress of Catholic literature. Situated as we are in this country in the midst of a non-believing majority which has almost absolute control of a powerful press, which shapes public opinion according to its will, which directs the policy of the nation, there is a sort of warfare thrust upon us. We dare not refuse it, we dare not even seek to avoid it, under penalty of being held recreant to our holy faith. All the standers against the fame and purity of the Catholic Church that have been coined during the last three hundred years, are current, here now and find multitudes of believers. All the misrepresentations of our tenets and devotional practices, which the heretics and schismatics of long ago invented for their own vile purposes, are generally accepted as truthful. Charity, then, impose on us a two-fold duty. For the sake of those who differ from us, that they may come to know the Church of God, we are bound to make manifest the truth by tearing off the hideous veil which its enemies have thrown over it. And for our own sakes we are bound to defend and explain our principles in morals, in politics, in all that binds man to society and to his Creator, that we may not suffer in our liberties through the ignorance of our adversaries. Of course, the only way to fulfill this duty efficiently is through the press. On the wide field of literature must our battle be principally fought. Consequently it ought be a subject of rejoicing to find our forces recruited—to see a large accession of strength made to our ranks. Some periodical like Brownson's is in a certain sense necessary to Catholicity in America. It would be the poorest of policies to allow our opponents to enjoy a monopoly of that high class of literature which appeals to men of scholarship and intellectual culture; because it would readily be construed into a tacit acknowledgment of the correctness of the charge which is so frequently brought against the Church—namely, that she is hostile to scientific investigation.

There never was a time since the Reformation in which men of really profound attainments could do better service to the cause of truth than at the present moment. Now people are unlearning a great portion of that which their forefathers implicitly believed during three centuries. The practice of taking authorities at second-hand, which was the very essence of that conspiracy against truth which has corrupted history, is being gradually done away with. To gather convincing evidence of this we have only to call to mind how much has been effected during the past twenty years towards casting that light upon obscure periods of ecclesiastical history, and redeeming from unmerited obloquy the men who were most enormously vilified by the anti-Catholic writers. This has been done altogether by going back to contemporaneous chroniclers, and finding out what those who lived with and knew the personages in question thought and wrote about them. The intelligent and reading classes of all countries, and of America especially, are prepared to receive new ideas, and it should be the mission of Catholic authors, journalists and writers to supply ideas adapted to that mind. Of course it is absolutely requisite, in order that good results may be obtained, that the individual undertaking to set the men of the time in the right path should himself be thoroughly conversant with it. Nothing, however, to the divinely-inspired pronouncements of the Holy Father, there is little danger of a conscientious Catholic writer leading his readers astray. The prevailing errors of our generation have been so clearly pointed out in the Syllabus of 1864, that the man who takes it for his guide will be sure to avoid all the great dangers that are likely to beset him. Liberalism, as it was foolishly called, was the most powerful enemy of orthodoxy for a while its seductive but pernicious principles led away a few of those who were deemed impregnable in the faith; but that enemy is now prostrate, because the Syllabus has completely overthrown and enmeshed it. Nobody speaks now of "liberal" Catholics but those who do not understand what a true Catholic is.

The line of demarcation between our friends and foes has been drawn by a master hand; it is so distinctly traced that blinded either by ignorance or vanity must he be who unwittingly transgresses it. There is not much reason to fear that those who are truly devoted to the Church will repeat the errors committed in so many instances from the year of revolutions—1848—up to 1864. During those days the wily foes of the Church scoffed the legitimate authorities with fruitless but false theories about the "rights of people." The men who applauded what were termed the "popular movements" in Italy and elsewhere did not know the plot against Christian society which they were countenancing. They must know it now if they ever had any desire to learn. To-day the secret and secret societies, foiled in their attempt to subvert authority, seek to uproot the very foundation of society through the agency of godless education. They are trying to loosen the most sacred ties and introduce pagan anarchy under the guise of freedom. To oppose these—to expose and defeat their machinations, to uphold the just cause, to defend truth, virtue and faith—should be the aim of those learned men who owe allegiance to the Seat of Peter, and are content to read their philosophy by the light reflected from the memorable Syllabus of 1864.

TAXING RELIGION.

In the annual report of the Mercantile Library Association, recently printed, complaint was made that the institution was compelled to pay taxes. The argument was raised that the Library was not, in the pecuniary sense of the word, a beneficial concern; that it was devoted to the spread of enlightenment, and that, consequently, it was putting an impost upon knowledge to subject it to taxation. With this reasoning we do not perfectly agree, as we consider it sound all through. It is folly on the part of any Government to lay tyranny off an institution which is maintained, not, for the profit or advantage of any man or any company, but solely for the public good. We would, however, like to see the required exemption pushed a little further than libraries or museums or art galleries. There is no argument in the Mercantile Library Association report with respect to this taxation question which does not apply with ten-fold force to the case of religious buildings. Churches, monasteries, convents, nurseries, reformatories, asylums, etc., are not pecuniarily beneficial to the Catholic religious who conduct them. Not the slightest idea of making money is allowed to enter into the policy of their management. The one thing kept in view is to glorify God by prayer and the good works of instructing, comforting and shielding all classes of humanity. If exemption be claimed for libraries on the ground that they are a great public benefit—that their tendency is to spread useful knowledge and diminish crime—the same plea certainly be urged on behalf of churches, and generally of all religious organizations. They spread knowledge far more important to mankind than that gathered up on bookshelves; and there can be no question as to their being infinitely more powerful for the repression of offenses against the law.

A man may be very learned, and be on that account only the more dangerous to society; but a man inclined with the spirit of religion will, under all circumstances, be a supporter of order. In continental Europe of late days ecclesiastical property of all kinds has been subjected to taxation; but that is done for the express purpose of persecuting the Church and increasing the strength of the secular Government. There assuredly is no desire on the part of any Federal or State Government here to act inimically to any section of Christians, and therefore we cannot understand why the exemption of religious establishments should be copied. Again, it is really only adding to the burden which has to be borne by the community at large, and not taking anything from the individuals who have charge of the property. From the people comes the money required for the support of the institutions we have mentioned, as, in themselves, they are productive of no revenue whatever; and when taxes are superadded, these, too, have to come out of the pockets of the people. So the clergy or religious do not pay the taxes, for the good and sufficient reason that they have none. They are simply trustees or managers of that which belongs to the members of their communion. Hence it is evident that taxing churches, etc., is nothing more or less than perpetually fining the people for upholding and supporting them. Unlikely as it may seem at present, we have every hope that our legislators will before long come to view this matter in a proper light, and will decree the cessation of the very bad and unprofitable policy of taxing church property.

ENGLAND AND RUSSIA.

The rumors of a difficulty existing between England and Russia, on account of the invasion of Kiva by the troops of the latter power, are daily gaining more credence. Indeed, the telegrams go so far as to say that the British Minister for Foreign Affairs has addressed a communication couched in terms amounting to positive menace to the St. Petersburg Cabinet. The London correspondent of the New York Herald says that England does not want to fight, but that if her Indian possessions are thought to be endangered by the course of Russia she is prepared, she will send a fleet to Cronstadt and march her soldiers to the aid of the Khan of Kiva. She sent a fleet to Cronstadt nearly twenty years ago, and it returned most ingloriously. CHARLEY Martin's bombastic order is, he says, "sharpen your cutlasses, my lads," is not yet forgotten. Her big ships wandered about the Baltic, hunting up little fishing villages to bombard; but the cutlasses never had their edges blunted. Russia is not to be bullied, more especially now since England will not be sustained by France, and if JOHN BULL has been foolish enough to indulge in tall talk, he will yet have to set his words.

THE SUNDAY LAW, of which so much has been said of late, has been a dead letter on the statute book, in substantially its present form, since 1861, and was never attempted to be enforced. Its enforcement is not now attempted in San Francisco, and I saither should it be elsewhere. Statutory enactments for the proper observance of the Lord's day are worse than useless.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION.

The Sunday School teachers held their annual reunion in the basement hall of St. Mary's Cathedral on the evening of the 26th instant. The attendance was very large, showing that the interest felt in the labors of the association is on the increase. A report was read by the Secretary, which contained some highly instructive statistics relating to the number of children receiving religious instruction in the different churches. From them we learn that more than four thousand five hundred boys and girls regularly attend Sunday School in the nine churches belonging to the city and suburbs; and if we add to these the numbers who are taught in the several convents by the Sisters, we have a total of considerably more than seven thousand children receiving instruction. The Catholic population of San Francisco does not probably exceed forty thousand altogether, so the Sunday School pupils are pretty nearly as numerous as they could be expected to be. This is of course owing to the laudable exertions of the pastors and teachers, who, since the Union was started, have worked in thorough accord. We are well pleased to note the efforts which have been made to circulate among the children that excellent little periodical called the Young Catholic. Nine hundred dollars is a tolerably large sum to expend upon juvenile literature, but considering that it has procured four thousand copies of the above mentioned magazine, we are forced to acknowledge that it was well and wisely spent. The Secretary's report would have been more satisfactory if it included some account of the number of children receiving instruction this time last year, so that we could form a just idea of the progress since then; but it contains so much upon which we may fairly congratulate ourselves that we have a scruple about finding fault with it. We should like very much that a copy of this report were left, with every Catholic family residing in the city, because it could hardly fail to impress them with a proper sense of the magnitude and importance of the work in which the Sunday School Union is engaged. And this is necessary. The holy zeal of the pastors, the devotedness of the teachers, the spirit animating the whole organization will be rendered to a great measure valueless if parents will not perform their duty and see that their children attend the instructions. Hundreds of Catholic boys and girls are being educated in the public schools, where, of course, they learn nothing at all about their religion; granting the improbable supposition that the influence of the training they receive is not such as to gradually lead them to despise it; and, in all human probability, nothing but Sunday School teachings can save their faith. Consequently, fathers and mothers should know that on them the responsibility rests, and before God, to make sure that their little ones are put in a way of learning Christian doctrine, and avoiding good Catholics. They will acquit themselves of this all-important duty by sending them regularly to Sunday School.

THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

The Mercantile Library is an institution of which our city has reason to be proud. It is at present excellently managed. The clerks and librarians are courteous, and spare no pains to accommodate the readers. The books that are added from day to day are, on the whole, well selected, pretty nearly all the branches of literature are proportionately represented. The different departments in the shelves are kept in fair order, and it is now much easier to lay one's hand on any book required than it used to be some time ago. Having said so much in common justice to the Library, we feel at liberty to call attention to one defect which we naturally consider very grievous. Catholic literature is not at all properly represented in the theological or any other department. We have been frequently informed, moreover, that a great indisposition to purchase works by Catholic authors prevails among those gentlemen whose duty it is to select new volumes. This is not fair. Many of the subscribers to the Library are Catholics, and nothing, in justice, should help our coreligionists more than allow in rendering it, nor would they be if help were needed again. The present is a period of great activity in our literary circles, and the emanations of Catholic intellect are remarkable for their vigor and scholarship. It would therefore be a great satisfaction to us to see that our position in the world of letters was properly recognized, and that Prospectants were not led to infer that we are behind hand in the labors of religious, historical and scientific investigation. We trust that this friendly remonstrance will be received in the proper spirit, and that we shall ere long see proof of it in the appearance on the shelves of some of the best works of Catholic writers of the present century. We make this remark, in conclusion, that we have reason to believe that if an invitation were extended, gentlemen would be found willing to donate books of the kind alluded to, and thus the library officials would be able to gratify a large number of patrons and friends without incurring any expense.

REMOVAL OF THE ORPHANS.—On Monday last the removal of the furniture of the Orphan Asylum was commenced. It could not be continued as the New Asylum is not far enough advanced to admit of the removal of the orphans. On Monday next, however, the moving will be resumed, and continued until the orphans are settled in their new home. Much remains to be taken out, and a continuation of the assistance so generously volunteered on last Monday will be very acceptable to the Sisters. Many wagons have been engaged for the first few days, therefore further assistance will be more acceptable after Wednesday.

A TRIANGULAR FIGHT.

Our Republican friends seem very much divided among themselves at the present moment. They are separated into two factions, with a good prospect of a third. The more respectable of their following want Booth to succeed Casserly in the United States Senate; while the "boys" and lobby elements are heart and soul for Gorham, or some other gentleman of easy virtue; and all who understand the workings of primaries, know that it is the "boys" who control them, so that Gorham's chances are immeasurably the better. It may not be generally remembered that twelve months ago, Sargent's election to the Senate was effected, or at least materially assisted, by a bargain and sale with Gorham to the effect that the latter would get Sargent's support for the place now filled by Mr. Casserly. It would seem, however, that Aaron regards such promises as did Thomas Shannon, Esq., when he brazenly said on the floor of the Assembly Chamber, that platforms were merely made to catch votes, and to be violated whenever profitable; for now comes a well-founded rumor that Gorham and Sargent have quarrelled, and that the latter wants Shannon for his colleague. Should this prove true, the Republican party will be divided, and in order to carry the primaries in any event, a mixed delegation will be returned to the Nominating Convention, who will place a mixed Legislative ticket in the field. Until the Republican ticket is elected, however, neither Gorham nor Shannon will appear publicly as candidates; for they know full well that their unpopularity with the masses even of their own party renders them sure of defeat of their creatures; but their friends once successful, they would stalk boldly into the arena, and either would unquestionably carry off the prize. Booth has no earthly show in the large cities. His rivals control the party machinery, and they know well how to manage it. Under these circumstances, we see no great difficulty in the Democracy electing the next election, provided it makes judicious nominations, and puts men of character and fitness forward as its standard bearers. The most potent lever they can use to overthrow the dominant party, is to keep this truth before the people—that George C. Gorham or Tom Shannon will disgrace the place of Eugene Casserly, if the Republicans carry the next general election.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY, 1873.

Preparation for a Grand Demonstration.

A Convention composed of delegates from the various Irish civic and military organizations was held, last Sunday afternoon, at Irish American Hall, Howard street, for the purpose of making arrangements to celebrate St. Patrick's Day in a becoming manner. The meeting was well attended.

The first business was the calling of the roll of the Hon. Secretary, Mr. M. Wards. The Societies then represented were the following named: Sons of the Emerald Isle Benevolent Association, Irish-American Benevolent Association, Workingmen's Protective Benevolent Association, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Divisions No. 1 to No. 10, Irish Volunteers, Companies A and 2; Legion of St. Patrick, and Irish Confederation, Burke and Lolby, Nos. 1 and 2.

The Secretary then read the minutes of the last Convention, which, after a few words by the President (Mr. M. F. Cummings), were, on the passing of the minutes, the labors of the Convention of 1872 ceased. Before dissolving he wished to return to the Convention his thanks for the very generous courtesy that had been shown him on all occasions.

The Chair then resolved that the delegates for the Convention of 1873 should appoint their own committee and not report upon credentials. From each delegation one member was taken to form the committee. The entire Irish press of the city retired for a short time, it reported that the following-named delegates were entitled to representation in the Convention: Sons of the Emerald Isle Benevolent Association, Irish-American Benevolent Association, Workingmen's Protective Benevolent Association, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Divisions No 7; Knights of St. Patrick, Divisions 1 and 2; Irish Confederation, Burke and Lolby Club, St. Joseph's Young Men's Association, Celtic Club, T. F. Burke Circle, Fenian Brotherhood, Thomas Davis Club, Irish Confederation, Burke and Lolby Circle, Fenian Brotherhood, Company "A," Legion of St. Patrick, Hibernian Rifles, St Joseph's Benevolent Society.

On motion, Col. A. Wason, commander of the Irish Regiment, was elected a member of the Convention; and the Field and Commissioned Staff of the Irish Regiment were also elected honorary members.

Mr. John Kennedy was unanimously elected President of the Convention, and Mr. M. Connolly, Vice-President; Denis Coyne, Secretary; and John Grant, Treasurer.

The meeting resolved that all moneys shall be paid into the hands of the Treasurer, and that all disbursements shall be made by him.

An adjournment then took place until next Sunday, when nominations for Grand Marshal will be in order.

Catholic Sunday Schools.

The annual reunion of the Catholic Sunday School teachers of the city took place last Sunday afternoon, in the basement of St. Mary's Cathedral. The attendance was very large. J. N. Adams, President of the Union, presided. The exercises opened with an original hymn—"To our Patron Saint, St. Charles Borromeo"—sung by the teachers and children of the classes, accompanied on the organ by Mr. Richard McCabe. Mr. Lawrence Nolan, who has ably discharged the duties of Secretary for the past eighteen months, read the report, of which we subjoin the following:

THE SECRETARY'S REPORT.

Shortly after my last report the Board of Directors obtained permission from the Archbishop to have a meeting for the benefit of the Union. Rev. Father Burchard, at the request of the Board, consented to deliver his lecture on "Women Suffragism." Colonel Peter Donahue tendered the use of Union Hall for the occasion, and after many unavoidable delays the lecture was given on the evening of November 20th. The result was a net profit to the Union of over nine hundred dollars ($900). This enabled the Directors to order the purchase of a large number of copies of the paper published by Rev. Father Hecker at New York, called the Young Catholic. Accordingly Mr. P. J. Thomas was authorized to send for four thousand copies of that publication, which were received in the month of December, and cost $600. These are mailed direct to fifteen schools, and are distributed by the Superintendents, Principals and Industrial School and to the orphan boys at Napa.

The catechism, prayer and hymn book, compiled by the Christian Brothers, mentioned in the last report, is now in press. The work continues to meet with favor, and the demand for it is increasing. The paper, although somewhat delayed, proves more durable and attractive, as well as cheaper, than was anticipated. A class book, arranged and adapted by the Union, has also been printed, and is now in use in the schools. The Board has also published a small work for the use of those beginning the catechism has been compiled by Rev. Father Brady, and also by Magister Johnson, Psychiatry, Mr. Flood.

It is a late meeting of the Board of Directors a resolution was adopted recommending the appointment of a Superintendent of Schools, to be elected by the Directors and being in such Saturday from the Sunday Schools of the city, and to be known as the School Superintendent."

"WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR BOYS?"

It does not come within the province of a secretary's report, but I cannot refrain from saying in connection a good suggestion is recently offered by Rev. Father Scanlan, in a letter to the Union. It is that the teachers may call influence to obtain for each on leaving school such employment as they may be fitted for. Many boys, on leaving the Primary, are thus made their useful members of the community. The plan has been tried in other cities with good results.

The following-named officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, J. N. Adams; Vice-President, J. P. Ryan; A. B. Magister, Rev. Father Scanlan; Secretary, Lawrence Nolan; Treasurer, Mr. Ryan. Directors—Mr. Brosnan, the Misses Fitzgerald, Mrs. Thomas (as retires, and is succeeded by Mr. Flynn), Miss Ryan, Miss Lynch, Miss Fitzgerald. The gentlemen were elected honorary members: Rev. Father Brady, Rev. Father Scanlan, Rev. Father Donahue and Hon. Jacob Montgomery.

The following is the TREASURER'S SCHOOLS indicate rapid progress in organization and efficiency. The number of teachers and scholars has increased nearly the case, where the rate bestowed on the pupils in the public schools would be considered a high one.

At St. Francis' the past quarter has been a busy one. The Sunday School has been under the care of the Sisters of Mercy, and is now most efficiently prosecuted by his predecessor, and with success. The Christmas entertainment was a success, both in the music of the Mass being sung very creditably by the children, and in the Christmas tree in the hall. Mr. McCabe, the Secretary the pastor gathers the larger boys around him, and instructs them in the catechism.

The Spanish children of the parish have been gathered into a class, and are taught by Rev. Father Gaffney, and are being well taught by Rev. Father Gaffney, assisted by Messrs. ## THE HIBERNIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

THE SECOND NIGHT.

Nothing but the reflection, that when she had last addressed Fita Thomas it was in words and accents that would make any appeal to his compassion incompatible with the dignity she ought to sustain, could have prevented Una O'Nolan from giving way to tears as she read this touching letter. As it was, her voice was tremulous with emotion, and her beautiful face alternately crimson red and the color of the lily. Fita Thomas sat as first uncertain and abashed before the grave severity of the sentence-less, and the offended feelings, as he fondly imagined, of the fair interpreter: but when at length he perceived the object of O'Nolan's letter, his diffidence vanished before the conscious sincerity of his good-will, as he leaped on his feet and ardently cried that he would shed the last drop of his blood in the defense of her father's house against whatever adversaries might come against it.

"Nay, noble sir," Una replied, recovering her self-possession as she found herself in the less difficult position of one depreciating instead of beseeching aid, "you must not have these profit either at my life or my allegiance in our quarrel. If our own people cannot hold the tower against Sir Baxter, we but ask thy humane interest with the victor, that the conquest shall be as bloodless as the generosity of thy people shall permit."

"Lady," cried Fita Thomas, "do not affect me by a scorn which I no longer deserve. I have no friends—I have no country; suffer me only to be thy friend, and thy country shall be mine! My heart has reproached me ever since I uttered that unworthy, but inconsiderate calumny of my nation. Thy words have wrung my soul with shame and remorse. I stand here to offer thee the service of my arm, if thou will but receive me as thy servant; then will but receive me as thy servant; then will but receive me as thy servant; then

FRIEZE FROM A HOSTILE SOURCE.—Mr. Froude, in one of his recent lectures, paid this compliment to the priesthood and people of Ireland: "I do not question the enormous power for good which has been exerted in Ireland by the modern Catholic priesthood. Ireland is one of the poorest countries in Europe, yet there is less stealing, less cheating, less house-breaking, less robbery of all kinds, than in any other country of the same size in the civilized world. In the district where I lived we slept with unlocked doors and open windows with as much security as if we had been—I will not say in London or New York, for I should have been extremely sorry to have tried the experiment in either place. I say we might have been with the same in Paradise for any danger to which we were exposed. In the last hundred years impunity has been almost unknown in Ireland. This absence of vulgar crime and this exceptional delicacy and modesty of character is due, to their everlasting honor, to the influence of the Catholic clergy."

The Boston Post says: "The Albany Young Men's Christian Association didn't have Christianity enough to save them from bankruptcy, and their property has been seized for debt."

Louis Philippe and Louis Napoleon, the last two rulers of France, both died in England.

Gambetta, the leader of the Red Republicans in France, is a Jew.

Death from Rupture being quite request we call the attention of our readers to the following notice written by the editor of the New York Sun Flash, who himself is a celebrated physician:

DR. SHERMAN'S CURE FOR RUPTURE.—The length of time this "Sherman Remedy for Ruptures" has stood the test of a trial should convince every sceptic that there is a permanent relief for this distressing and dangerous complaint, so prevalent in the human family. Dr. Sherman has done so immense business in the city of New York for years, with his remedial agent, and it is not possible for "quackery" to sustain itself for short month under the enormous expenses attending such a professional career as this gentleman has passed through, and is now engaged in. We advise all persons afflicted with rupture to at once make their case known to him. He is thoroughly and so successful a campaign as Dr. Sherman has carried on against "the family" touching the modus operandi of conquering this human ill, is convincing proof that he has the better understanding of the complaint he treats as a specialty

Why Endure What is Curable!

"What can't be cured must be endured," says the proverb; but subscription can be cured, and therefore it is the most stupidity to endure it. Dyspeptics have certainly a right to endure dyspepsia to the end of their days if they choose, but as it is not suppose that they have any inclination to manifest their need in case and health, the probability is that if all dyspeptics knew that Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, infallible remedy for their complaint, existed, they would with one accord resort to it. We most emphatically declare that such a remedy does exist, and that its name is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. The record of its success extends over a period of more than twenty years, and it is fearlessly alleged that during the whole of that time it has never failed to afford permanent relief in any disorder deranged state of the stomach that was not organic, malignant and hopeless. The testimonials that go to establish this important fact can be counted by the thousand, and they are derived from all classes, headed by a host the corps of all sinners, rules, and interests. Where rendered chronic by medicinal treatment or drastic purgatives, have to hundreds of instances been cured within three months by the systematic use of the aforesaid stomachic and alterative. It should be remembered that weakness of the digestive organs involves many other ailments. Biliousness, insomnia, nervous debility, spasms, palpitation of the heart, rush of blood to the head, tremors, vertigo and kindred are among its concomitants and results; and for all of these the great vegetable tonic is a specific. It acts first upon the stomach, and through the stomach upon the respiratory and nervous systems and the bowels. In general debility, always a source of breakdown.

"CLAN OLIVER."

Now came in the deluge of Cromwellians, who were termed by the Irish Clan Oliver, and the invaders of Elizabeth's day had been called sometimes Clan London, or Clan Saxonagh. It is not my purpose to follow Froude through all his details relating to the Cromwellian settlement; because this is reordered unnecessary by the admirable work of Mr. Prendergast, and Froude has himself fully adjusted in one place the accuracy of Mr. Prendergast's facts and authorities. What is material to point out here is, that the historian must severally approves of the régime established by Cromwell in Ireland, only lamenting that he "did too soon." Speaking of that General and his indiscriminate slaughters of soldiers and civilians, of men, women and children at Drogheda and Wexford, he says, pathetically, "Happier far would it have been for Ireland if, forty years later, there had been a second Cromwell before Limerick!" Limerick city had had their throats cut, in Elizabeth's day as they were after Cromwell's time, but the treaty was to be instantly violated. This Historian does not mind being charged with bloodthirstiness on the contrary, he is flattered by it; he loves to write of blood, and to urge on other people the duty of shedding it; the odor of gore is grateful to his nostrils, whereas he despises organs of weakness in Carlyle's phrase to designate any kind of gentleness or mercy, or even ordinary good faith observed towards Papists. Cromwell, he says with delight, did not assuredly be to say with delight, did not assuredly come beforehand "to make war with rose-water." No, it was the genuine red liquid, venous and arterial. There is no part of the Cromwellian system which seems to give this model heartfelt pleasure as the treatment of the priests. Only it was too mild, and was applied for too short a time; if the great was applied for too short a time; if the great statesman had but lived, there would soon have been not a single priest left to "work disbelief"—which is his way of describing the saying of Mass.

THE WAR-WOLVES.

The good Father Burke, who is so amiable towards Froude, must be all the while aware of how it would have fared with himself if he had lived in the time of Froude's hero. Doubtless it is the duty of a Christian divine to love all men, even his enemies; indeed he is in this sense that he said he loved Froude. But he knows very well that he himself (Father Burke's) head is exactly of the same value as the head of a Irish wolf—namely, six pounds sterling of the money of that day, equal, we may say, to eighteen pounds of to-day. And it will not do to say that Froude estimates the the goods at that price, whereas Philpstoun, on the way to Carrickfergus, had first felt desperately sick, and was in danger of perishing in a dungeon from want and hardship. After months the Commons' decision ordered him an allowance of six-pence a day; and when he should be well enough to move, this allowance was to be continued to him during his journey to Carrickfergus, "in order to his return from thence to the Barbadoes." It would not be much sugar Father Paul would make who was being set down there and bidden to take up the shovel and the hoe; but the authorities thought that under a Barbadoes planter he would at least be kept from "unlocher"—that is, from Mass and Confession. The difficulty suggested by Froude in the paragraph above cited—How, and to who: ships sailed from Ireland to Barbadoes—is solved were these 80,000 sent to Barbadoes—by any serious difficulty. The operation was extended over several years; and shipping was not so very scarce then, either in England or Ireland. Besides, Doctor Sir William Petty and other adventurers were employing all the shipyards in the kingdom in filling up all the shipyards in the kingdom with the best of Irish timber. Still there was some shortcomings in the tonnage available for this service, and it cost too much; so that, on the 27th of February, 1657, the Government referred it to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, only lamenting that the "did too soon." Speaking of that General and his indiscriminate slaughters of soldiers and civilians, of men, women and children at Drogheda and Wexford, he says, pathetically, "Happier far would it have been for Ireland if, forty years later, there had been a second Cromwell before Limerick!" (Page 125). It had been better, he thinks, if Sarsfield and his men, and all the peaceful traders, and all the heroic women of that ill-fated city had had their throats cut, instead of being admitted to a treaty. Perhaps instead of being admitted to a treaty. Perhaps stead of being admitted to a treaty. Perhaps stead of being admitted to a treaty. Perhaps so he is right, seeing that the treaty was to be instantly violated. This Historian does not mind being charged with bloodthirstiness on the contrary, he is flattered by it; he loves to write of blood, and to urge on other people the duty of shedding it; the odor of gore is grateful to his nostrils, whereas he despises organs of weakness in Carlyle's phrase to designate any kind of gentleness or mercy, or even ordinary good faith observed towards Papists. And it will not do to say that Froude estimates the the goods at that price, whereas that there were a Cromwell for Ireland's sake now! For, then, the wolves were cleared off entirely, there are priests in Ireland still. But, certainly, while the price was enough, the priest's head-money ought to have been raised. M'Gown settlement of the value of Father Burke's head differs from Froude's, and is based upon another sort of tariff; for I hold it to be worth at least five hundred heads of the Froude. Let bob-dy deceive himself, however, by assuming that the Irish people discusses those matters in a historic spirit—as matters whose interest is long past and gone with the changing current of events. By no means; he treats them in the spirit of a party pamphleteer, and with an obvious intention to act upon the present politics and passions of men. Thus, instead of giving a history of praise to the devoted clergy who persisted in hearing confessions and administering sacraments, under the imminent penalty of transportation and of death, he never mentions those wonderful laws which should shame any calumny. "Priests and dispossessed proprietors!" he says, "were hiding in disguise among the woods, living wonderfully when they were able." He never alludes to the deadly risks those clergy ran in staying by their flocks. Close at his hand he has inspection of documents, in public record offices, he never found a bible copy furnished by and paid to God-fearing troopers for their captures.—"To fire priests captured in the county of Leitrim and wood, and to hang priests with their appurtenances (namely books and cups and stoles), cast in by Lieutenant M'Leod," said so-forth, to great fees for which see Prendergrass and Curry.—you would not find in the Historian of "The English in Ireland." He cannot help, indeed, mentioning some of the severe measures used against the clergy; he only affirms that not so many were transported as those who were arrested; but nobody had said there were.

BARBADOES.

As to the people actually transported from Ireland to Barbadoes or other colonial plantations, he, in his last lecture questions Father Burke's estimate of the numbers so exiled within a few years. He says:

"Father Burke says that Cromwell meant to exterminate the Irish. I shall speak again between the indications Irish and the idle, fighting Irish. He showed his intention towards the peasantry a few days after his landing, for he hung two of his own troopers for stealing a hog from one of the natives. Cromwell, says the Father, wound up the war by taking 80,000 men and shipping them to the sugar plantations of the Indies. In six years' men was the enemy, that not twenty of these were left. Eighty thousand men, Father Burke, and in six years not twenty left! I have read the Thurloe Papers, and I question the accuracy of these shipments to Barbadoes.

"But what is there to be done? I can find nothing about 80,000 men there Who were these kept out, and how, and to what ships?"

I think, however, that Father Burke's estimate is not far from correct; though, to be sure, 80,000 is a large round numbers, but it is well known that the desperately both of priests and of laymen, of young men and maidens, was on a very large scale. In consequence of the great horrors of priests towards the close of the year 1660, a general arrest by the justices of the peace was ordered; it was the sporting season for priests, and even wolves were left comparatively at peace for a time. On the 2d of May," says Prendergrass, "the governors of the respective precincts were ordered to send them with sufficient guards from garrison to garrison to Carrickfergus, to be there put on board such ships as should sail with the first opportunity for the Barbadoes." Poor old Father Paul Oaths, a very aconitant and frail man, being approbended at Mayr borough, and sent on to Carrickfergus, and by to Carrickfergus, there to be kept safely and securely till this, with full resolution to brave all his dangers, and to continue in the Irishmen, fresh from the colleges of Belgium and of Spain, came to the French seacoast at Brest or St. Malo, bent on finding some way of creeping to where their work lay. Imagine a priest ordained at Seville or Salamanca, a gentleman of high ecclesiastic, a man of eloquence and genius, who had sustained disputations in the college halls on questions of literature and theology—imagine him on the quays of Brest, treating with the skipper of some vessel to let him work his passage; he wears tarry breeches and a tarpaulin hat (for disguise was generally needful)—he flings himself on board, takes his full part in all hard work, scarce feels the cold spray and the fierce tempest. And he knows, too, that the end of it all, for him, must be a row of sugar canes to hoe, under the blazing sun of Barbadoes, overlooked by a broad-bat-ted agent of a Bristol planter; yet he goes eagerly to meet his fate for he carries in his hands a sacred deposit, bears in his heart a sacred message, and must deliver it or die. Imagine him, then, springing ashore and repairing to seek the bishop of the diocese in some cave, or hiding-place, some hedge, or bush, or ditch, with caution by reason of the priest catchers and their wolf-dogs. But Froude would say, that is the fate of priests you have been portraying. No it is the real priest as he existed and acted at that day; and as he would again act in a like emergency. And is there nothing admirable in all this? Is there not something human and sublime? Ah! we Protestants are certainly most enlightened creatures on the earth. We stand, each of us, with triumphant conceit upon the summit and the centre of human life, and we look down and with compassion upon the pigmies that creep below. Our own particular religion we have settled to our satisfaction, and that was done for us by the Government Inspectors, and by the Parliament; we have no possible motive for exaggerating passings, hurgations and sayings in which the intent to murder, in one year than the whole of Ireland can show. What, then, thinks the Historian, is the provocation which is likely to drive his countrymen to new revolt in Ireland? Can it be the Home Rule agitation—an agitation which is not only perfectly legal and constitutional, but also entirely harmless and useless? No; strictly speaking, it is not the only some Irishmen are making, claiming that they ought to be governed according to "Irish ideas"—governed by England, neither can this Historian, their English masters much. Their English masters know how to deal with such pretensions as those; by setting on such newspapers as offend them, and by trying the most noisy of the agitators before packed juries! What, then, provokes, does the Historian's ominous threat portend? What does he wish his countrymen to do to us more? It may be that the learned and eloquent gentleman, having lived a good deal more accustomed than the people of the interest of their children, they should, either send them to no school at all, or they should send them to Protestant schools; they are much less able to give them a good education than those schools, which are under Government inspection and under the spiritual care and guidance of your pastor. The great number that come to these schools abundantly testify to the zeal which animates the parents with regard to education, and their efficiency is a proof of dered of their own cathedrals, churches and abbey-lands, are now, found in possession of new and splendid churches, and of great and handsome religious houses.

Here is a matter which is evidently worthy of the serious consideration of us enlightened Protestants for the earth is not ours and the fullness thereof, we should like to know to whom it does belong! Would not a good, prudent system of penal laws, [okey those idolatrous Papists out of all their own, even as before? And is it any wonder that Historian Froude begins really to fear that England may be forced to resort to the old system of coercion once more?

Is this the explanation of his ominous menace, or is it merely, (as one of his Irish Catholics has insisted) a general craving for blood, taken, like full part in all hard work, scarce feels the cold spray and the fierce tempest. And he knows, too, that the end of it all, for him, must be a row of sugar canes to hoe, under the blazing sun of Barbadoes, overlooked by a broad-bat-ted agent of a Bristol planter; yet he goes eagerly to meet his fate for he carries in his hands a sacred deposit, bears in his heart a sacred message, and must deliver it or die. ## CATHOLIC SCHOOLS AND EDUCATION.

Address by the Rt. Rev. Herbert Vaughan, Bishop of Salford.

On the evening of December 26th his Lordship the Right Rev. Herbert Vaughan visited the church of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, Salford. The attendance was large that many were unable to gain admission. The choir sang the hymn, "Sacred Heart of Jesus," in which the congregation joined with great enthusiasm; after which his Lordship addressed them as presented as follows:

After the persecution of Jesus Christ by the Jews and the Gentiles, and after His death, which consummated the sacrifice of the redeemed body, a soldier rode up—a man of the world—with a spear, and pierced the Sacred Heart—opened His side and laid bare—but He was dead, and there came forth from it, water and blood, and though he was dead, they had persecuted Him, and they have put me to death, and my heart is the sign of my love and my desire of God's blessed. Just as it was with the heart of Jesus Christ, so is it with the Catholic Church. He died, but His life—the body of Christ, St. Paul calls it. And we have an instance mentioned in the persecution of the Christians by the persecuting powers on the Continent have just closed churches and have laid Bishops under penalties, because they have consecrated their diocese and their churches to the Sacred Heart of Jesus Christ. It is a glorious title this persecution, which has been raging against the Church for so many months past, and from which for so many months past, and from which we have been praying that the persecutors would prove to the world what it was that offended them, and why it was that they wished to put the Church under penalties and sufferings, and to crush, if they could, her very life. I have not time to enter into a detail of what it is that has caused them to persecute men, in that they have a system that leaves God and which is faithful to Him, and that is the Catholic is open to all mankind and which will tell them that they are free to do what they will while she tells them to their face what is the truth, she opens out her arms in love, and redemption to them for every sin they repent of their persecution, to welcome them back to her again. The position which has just been taken up by the Catholic body was very grateful to my heart, because it is a position that nearly all the Catholics in the whole of this diocese shall be consecrated to the Sacred Heart of Jesus—the all and every one of them, and the children of all happiness. The Heart is the emblem of the love of Jesus Christ—the union of the human and of that Divine love which he possesses. And you all wish to be consecrated by your pastor to the Sacred Heart of our Lord; and you desire not only that you, but that the whole congregation should be consecrated, and I am glad to see so many here present, and I will continue to do so until the end. They determined to accept of no consecration except that which should be a truly Christian consecration; for it is by their obedience and have declared again and again, that it is impossible to educate a Christian unless you gain the hearts of the parents and as the people are determined to remain Christian and Catholic, their

EDUCATION MUST EMANCIPATE BE CHRISTIAN

And Catholic also. Well, now, we know that the parents are the first educators, or rather, I will not say a strong party, but a small and noisy party—a party full of enthusiasm—a party full of energy, and they have determined to do away with the Catholic schools and banish religion from education. We know that, at present, they have their orators—their lecturers—going about the town in the country, endeavoring to persuade the people that religion is necessary in secular instruction and religion ought to take place. They are no doubt active—at least they are in the city of London, and I am continually of the opinions which they put forward—sometimes with great care and subtlety and at other times openly and without any shame or hesitation. Now, what are we doing—we who are in favor of mixed Education, suddenly recovering from pretended illness, and when he gets schemes for swamping the Rome of the defeated, hastened to Berlin and tried the Bismarck's method. Bismarck was by the spirit of religion, and it is by the spirit of religion, and it is by the spirit of religious education that we shall find the will overcome. We will not be satisfied with mere secular education, but we will have a religious education, and we will have a religious education, and we will have a religious education, and

AUSTRALIAN STEAMSHIP SUBSIDY

The Australian Steamship Subsidy bill, has been [illegible] in the United States Senate, Mr. Wren's best friends could hardly have expected any other ending but the abortive. When the line for which the subsidy was demanded was first started we declared our opinion that no good or sufficient reason could be adduced why it should receive any grant of the people's money. The commercial relations existing or likely to exist between this country and Australia were by no means such as to warrant the Government in paying Mr. Wren a good round sum every year for maintaining the communication. The British colonies produce nothing which we could use here, as we have precisely the same articles in abundance on our own soil. Wool, tallow, hides, bones and minerals are pretty nearly all the exports that Australia can boast of, and England takes the greater portion of this whole. On the other hand, America can send the colonies nothing which they cannot procure better and cheaper from the mother country. We are quite unable to compete with the British in the manufacture of those articles most largely consumed in Australia, because, were it not for the high tariff, they would undersell us at our own doors. So there was very little real foundation for the sanguine expectations of those who declared they hoped to see an extensive and remunerative trade springing up between America and Australia in consequence of the establishment of Mr. Wren's steamship line. A glance at the manifests of the cargoes carried by the steamers which have performed the trips between San Francisco and Sydney during the past two years, would convince any moderately intelligent person of the correctness of what we say; but, unfortunately, the public will not take the trouble to give even a glance, and will persist in founding their ideas of the matter upon the statements of newspapers that are willing to help any one to make a haul out of the national treasury, provided they get a share of the spoils.

We grant there is a possibility, if staunch and speedy vessels were put on, that the transmission of mails between Australia and the Great Britain might be expedited a day or two; but we do not know that the United States ought pay money to obtain this [illegible] for their own [illegible] that does this country no good. It is generally admitted that the holding desirable from these voyagers would go only a small way towards recouping us the amount of the subsidy. But the wretched style of vessels put on the route by Mr. Wren has most effectually prevented any advantage whatever accruing to America, to England or to Australia. Old and hardly sea-worthy, his steamers plow their way through the waters of the Pacific at a rate of which the old liners of forty years ago would be ashamed. Three or four times only, we believe, out of all the voyages made, did they reach Honolulu in a proper time to make connection with the steamer for New Zealand. These have been delays and postponements without number in starting from both ends of the line, and, as a matter of course, utter uncertainty as to the time of their arrival. In brief, as far as our judgment goes, the only reason for the existence of the Australia steam line at all is to be found in the fact that Mr. Wren had half a dozen third-rate ships lying idle, which he thought he might as well set running between San Francisco and Honolulu for the chance of obtaining a handsome subsidy. There is so much discontent at the present time with the management of the American mercantile marine, that even the bad expedient of subsidizing would by many be willingly resorted to in order to improve it. If, therefore, the people are willing to pay Mr. Wren for the honor and glory of keeping a line of steamships running between this country and Australia, all very well. But let the matter be rightly understood, and let not the benefit or trade be urged as a plea for that which is done simply for the purpose of feeding ships on useless and profitless voyages. We are therefore glad to see that the Senate is not disposed to pay out thousands of dollars for the sake of giving Mr. Wren a chance of floating his bunting in the breeze of Port Jackson.

THE Sacramento Union terms United States Senator elect Sargent a "spiritual shickalee," while the Bulletin and Call are unctuous in their denunciations, and the Chronicle says that his selection to the Senate was a gross fraud, growing out of a corrupt bargain between himself and Gorham, aided by all the mercenary elements of the Republican party." And yet these papers were his warm advocates, and the warm advocates of the creature who made him [illegible]

THE World, Frankfort, refused to publish a communication which it had in type, because it noticed the Fenian coup in a contemptuous manner, and said: "Our correspondents will please bear in mind that communications to this paper must be for this paper and no other." Some of our correspondents might take a hint.

AN ANTI-IRISH CONSPIRACY.

The Chronicle of Wednesday gives an account of a [illegible] calls "a new politico-religious organization" which has been organized for the [illegible] the spread of Catholicism, and [illegible] the election to office of [illegible] members of this society, but we never thought it worthy of notice. The American mind is not intolerant, and the man who proposes to ostracize fellow-citizens [illegible] never make much impression in [illegible] localities they may obtain a foothold, but even that can only be temporary. The instant it becomes a matter of notoriety that any body of men seek to make creed or nationality a test of eligibility to office, the common sense of the community will put them down very summarily. The lime for that kind of work is gone by, and it never can be recalled. The army that rescued the Union from destruction, that saved the Republic that preserved the best Government the world ever saw, was composed of soldiers from every land and of every faith. If the principles of this secret society were carried out, and they were only intended for the benefit of the Irish Catholics, it would have been the cause of the establishment of this secret organization, were brought about by a conviction, which we believe now to have been well-founded, that wrong was being done to the Democracy of New York, and that they were being sacrificed, that the men of other more favored localities might be saved. They are not organized on a sectional or national in their aspect it all, though a large number of the participants in them were Irish and Catholic. They were simply a series of wild revolts against open and avowed wrong, and nothing else. Let us assert, moreover, that the majority of the members of this association constituted an important section of the "home guards," and never did any of the fighting.

As for the idea of checking the spread of Catholicity, it is so absurd that we cannot understand how it can be entertained by any man possessed of intelligence. No clique of bigots can prevent parents from bringing up their children in the fear and love of God according to the ancient faith. No secret conspiracy can hinder an unobjectionable citizen, with the average ability and [illegible] from [illegible] and [illegible] to the front. The unhappiness[illegible] man is the poorest, [illegible] and [illegible] a nervous way that he pays for [illegible] make sure that he would prove the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

MY FRIEND—MY FRIEND.

A thousand thoughts, unwritten and unspoken,
By fears my breast as fast their home with thee!
And not one line of remembrance is broken
Which bound thee to the dear old time to me.

So day goes by with heavy step or fleeting,
But bears its freight of loving hope or fear,
With which, for thy dear sake, my heart is beating
As quick and fond as though thou still were near.

Or morning hour nor evening shines or darkens
Without some mention from my soul to thine;
And as for thy reply my spirit hearkens,
The winds bring answer that all then art is mine.

I know that through the dark and hopeless sorrow
Thy shad'ow as of love hath never yet stood;
And though no cry of promise gild the morrow,
Each day will prove our trust more true and good.

What matters, then, for us this earthly parting?
What though the daily life be sad and lone?
Ah me! such tears as these should ne'er be wasting
To eye that soon have looked into thine own.

My friend! my friend! forgive my weak complaining,
I shrink at thought of all these passing years!
But see—see—many yet remain with me—
Move one I choose not count them through my tears!

THE HIBERNIAN NIGHTS' ENTERTAINMENTS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

The Captive of Killeshin—(Concluded.)

While he indulged in these bitter reflections, the tumult in the woods was growing louder and nearer at every shout, and at length, with a sound as if a storm were tearing its way through the forest, came rushing, trampling, bellowing, the maddened animals. They burst from every outlet of the wood in dark and tempestuous torrents, that seemed to flow from a perpetual source, so innumerable was the multitude of beeves and other animals. The leaders, refusing the ford, ran wildly up and down, pawing the ground, and roaring with rage and terror. They were driven back at either side by the men at arms; still they refused to take the water. The rear gathered against these as a stream against its barriers, until the whole open space between the wood and river was filled with the heaving and reeking mass. The vapor from their fresh sides hung over them like steam above a seething cauldron; while the lowing of the heifers, the piteous bleating of the sheep, the horrible cries of the oxen and bellows of the bulls, raised such a tumult as drowned both the clamor of the drivers and the din of arms.

But the force of man at length prevailed, the sullen leaders gave way before the point of the spear, and the accumulated throng poured down upon the river. The water rose in a broad sheet of foam before their breasts, and swelled against the solid mass of their wedged bodies; but long ere the foremost had reached the nearer bank, their order was broken, and the river rushed through their thinned numbers; for many had been borne by the violence of the current over the shallows of the ford, and were vainly struggling with the rush of the mountain stream that fell into the deep water below; while others, heeding up the river, were swimming wide of the landing place, or could not make good their footing on the higher bank. When the captors perceived their loss they sent forward a body of cavalry who formed in line across the river, on the lower shallows, and with their spears the cattle as they passed to the center of the ford. For a full hour the prey continued to pour across the Barrow, and the opposite ground was not yet cleared of the herd. Ten thousand head of cattle had been driven out of Mi Kinshella! But with the prey were now crossing numerous bodies of foot and horse, hardly distinguished from the dark intense bluish them in the deepening twilight. The cattle were driven together under the abbey walls, and the troops, as they arrived, were drawn up on the water's edge, at either side of the advancing column. It was now plain that the main army were busily engaged in defending their position on Tinnehinch, for as the field on that side was abandoned by the departing herds, it was rapidly occupied by horse and foot pressing on to the fords, as if auxious to place the Barrow between them and their assailants, with as little delay as might be. The river, too, was evidently slacking, and soon assumed a passable ford with greater difficulty.

It was at this crisis that Fits Thomas first perceived that the position of Cuby's horse, upon the left of the abbey, was attacked by a force from the hill and wood on that flank. The first shout of the onset was hardly drowned in the noise of battle, when the river above was suddenly illuminated by floating fires launched from either bank on rafts of rushes and bundles. By their light, he could see in the distance, bosky full of gallowglass crossing over, and the heads, above the now submrowned waters, of hundreds of kern swimming from the opposite bank. The attack on Cosby's post was redoubled; his men at arms were forced back before an overwhelming multitude of horse and foot. They debated every inch of ground, but in vain; and after a furious rallonade were driven in, pell-mell, upon the mass of cattle. They threw themselves one after another among the astonished herd, while their shouts of "keeping their line" were broken, pushed both men and beasts, with shouts and blows, back upon the river.

It was in vain that De Ryddel tried to stem the rush of such a multitude, for the slope of the ground was with the flying host, and the more weight of their charge was sufficient to bear down any opposition to each other. Like a gallant soldier, however, he made good his stand upon the spot of level ground below the bridge, upon the bank of the stream that had covered that flank of his position. Here he was in direct communication with the main army, from which numerous means of infantry were now detached to his aid. The river seemed no longer a causeway, so fully was its ford occupied by the advancing concow; but the bed of the stream was now so low turned, for the routed throng from before the abbey were pouring back with irresistible impetuosity on those advancing; and they, shocked or repulsed in front, and terrified by the now blazing of arms behind them, passed also by the accumulating weight of wasty, and scrambling for the shallows, bore down against the parallel march of the infantry, whose shouts and imprecations rose fearfully above the loud-est of the fray; for they were up to the middle in water, upon the lowest verge of the shallows, and if thrust from their march, must perish in the deep water and the meeting current below.

This was the purpose of the Irish, and their design took fearful effect. Fits Thomas behind the dark mass that crowded upon the river contained for a moment, and writhing like a single being in agony; the water then bulged, the line wavered, and then rose a cry of despair, from bank to bank, that drowned every other sound, as the whole multitude flooded away like the rush of a broken bridge, tumbling and flashing in the irresistible waters. For a moment the river was alive with the rolling bodies of men and cattle, swept over and under one another, or swimming through the driving tumult, shrieking or bellowing as they were again thrown down by other struggliers; but the wreck of victory and plunder was soon swallowed up or hurried out of sight down the darkness, and into the next reach of the river. The ordeal came fainter and fainter from the distance, and in the silence that succeeded among the astounded spectators—for no shout of triumph rose from the Irish, as they gazed in breathless wonder on the success of their desperate stratagem—might be heard the bleat of a solitary lamb, as it stood alone upon the bank, up which it had clambered from the side of its drowning mother.

The first man to rouse himself to action, from the astonishment and dread of the moment, was De Ryddel. He was now cut off from the remnant of the Earl's army, as well as from the abbey; a raging torrent behind, a savage enemy before him. He did not consume his time in unavailing efforts to save the few that still clung round the bank bedlow him, but shouting "Saint George for England!" charged at the head of his company right through the center of the Irish, and gained the abbey gate with little loss. Fits Thomas observed among his troopers, as he entered, a number of the native auxiliaries who had escaped from the fords. Their leader, a man of ferocious aspect, rode next De Ryddel. He was drenched with water, and bore the marks of a desperate struggle for his escape. Scarce had they gained the entrance, when the Irish, flushed with their success, rushed to the assault, and as the gates would be closed were at blows hand to hand with the blacksmiths. It determined to fight second, close under Fits Thomas, but in the dusk twilight he could see nothing distinctly. The Irish auxiliaries fought with the bravery of their nation, but with the perverted hatred of their own country for which they have so long been infamous. They were slain almost to a man, for they rode the last of the retreating party, and had to bear the first onset of the pursuers.

Fits Thomas would no longer stay to observe the course of the conflict had not better chance of escaping from the pursuers order, who accompanied the Irish, held lighted torches to give their friends the in the dusk twilight he could see nothing sorcerer's confession mounted a portdistinctly. ## INDEXING THE FUTURE.

Henry Ward Beecher on Compulsory State Education.

For years we have been aware that there is a large class of men in this country who are determined to inflict a blow on the Catholic Church by interfering in the most unlawful and unhallowed manner with the sacred relations between parent and child. The pretence on which these people intend to act, when the opportune moment arrives, and the deceptive shibboleth they use, is "education"—the right of the State to make education compulsory. We claim no great power of prophecy, but we have long ago predicted, and been laughed at for noticing that this claim would eventually be pushed with vigor. Of course the way must be paved for the legal (not rightful) infliction of this outrage. A great name is wanted—that is, as "great names" are now considered—under which the effort may be made in this direction. And such an one is now obtained. Henry Ward Beecher comes forward as the coryphæus in this movement for compulsory State education. On Tuesday evening last he lectured in New York on the necessity of compulsory education by the State, and, among other things, he said:

> Ignorance should not be permitted in the State; that is to say, education should be compulsory. The day was coming that almost every man who was voting on education should be compulsory." In that it makes a question of the proper function of the State, the right and duty of every subject, believing that it is divine right which the State represents, to train children, exactly as they please—to educate them as Hindu, or perhaps not educate them at all; so that to compel is education seems a contradiction. The short argument of compulsory education is the education without knowledge of a majority of the State's children. If the people say: "If the schools are good, many now not sending them would come to parochial schools," etc., etc. There is a vast number of uneducated foreigners, and uneducated children in the land. And they don't understand the necessity and advantages of education until after they have lost it. Then they admit them, and then they catch the spirit of the thing at once.

There is the whole thing in a nut-shell—denial of the right of parents to educate their children exactly as they please," and that "the foreigners" who "don't understand the necessity and advantages" of education. Now, by "foreigners" is meant, simply, Catholics, and we should have thought more highly of Mr. Beecher had he used no circumlocution in his language, but expressed himself exactly as he meant to be understood.

Under proper conditions we do not say we should object to a certain degree of compulsory education; but in this instance it means, in plain terms, just this: Catholics shall be compelled, by law, to send their children to the public schools, where every effort is made to undermine their faith; where they shall be taught that "United Italy," so-called, is a glorious country, founded on the ruins of a Papal despotism; that Garibaldi is a hero deserving co-equal praise with Washington; that Spain, Portugal and Mexico are filled with "Popish superstitions;" that Galileo was "imprisoned by the Pope for declaring that the earth moved round the sun;" that Luther overthrew "Romish intolerance" in Germany, and "ushered in a day of glorious light and spiritual freedom;" that "the Catholic Church is responsible for massacres of St. Bartholomew's Eve;" and much more to the same effect. How do our Catholic readers like the picture? Yet, every one of the false and foul charges Mr. Beecher makes above are laid down in what are or were school-books to the common schools.

Why, if Mr. Beecher's theory prevails, it will not be in order to compel some poor Catholic boy to declare, in the usual declamatory display, of course, you know) the sermons of the Plymouth preacher, alluded to in the Catholic Union the week ago, wherein he blasphemously says:

"There are some people who would positively benefit by a sin now and then. It would help them to get rid of that way-like perfection, which is the most hideous sin which is cold, sickly-looking, lifeless and inhuman."

The outrage would be no greater than the one he now sanctions. We are glad the compulsionists have shown their hand. Forewarned is forearmed.—Buffalo Catholic Union.

The Franco-Prussian War.

The last war between Germany and France was declared on July 15, 1870, and terminated February 16, 1871, lasting 210 days, but practically 186 days, in consequence of the first and last periods being free from engagements. On the week the German troops were "mobilized," prepared to march, and in two weeks were dispatched to the west, and were arranged on the line from Trarve to Landau. From the troops sent to the frontier numbered 900,000; and 1,200 guns with horses, guns, carriages and ammunition, were conveyed every day on five lines of railway, two of which, however, were little "used. Four Prussian corps d'armée had to traverse from 400 to 900 miles to reach the French frontier, and had to be fed on the way. During the 186 days of active service there were fought 156 engagements and 17 great battles; 26 fortresses were taken; 11,850 officers and 345,000 men of rank and file were made prisoners, and 5,700 guns and 360 eagles were captured. Having regard to the chronological order of the actions up to Sedan, there were 18 engagements and 8 battles, to wit: Wissembourg, Woerth, Spicheren, Courcelles, Vionville, Gravelotte, Noisseville and Beaumont; while the battles of Metz, Strasbourg, Montmedy, Marsal and Vitry were captured. In October there were three seven engagements, and Soissons, Schelestadt and Metz were taken. In November there were fifteen engagements and two battles, those of Amiens and Beaune-la-Rolande, and Montbeliard, Villersexel, New Breisach, Ham, Didenhofen, Lafere and the citadel of Metz surrendered to the Germans. In December there were 24 engagements and two battles, one near Orleans and the other on the Lisaine, and Phalsbourg and Montmedy. In January, 1871, there were forty-eight engagements and the battles of Lesmons, Montbliard and St. Quentin, and Mesieres, Rouvray, Pithiviers, Longwy and Paris capitulated. The war terminated in February, with the surrender of Belfort. Twenty-two engagements were fought around Paris during the one hundred and thirty days of the investment. Of these twenty-two engagements, three occurred in September, eight in October, two in November, four in December, and five in January. There were only three naval engagements, to wit at Hildasoe on September 19th, in the Polzig Bay on September 21st, and off the Havana on October 12th.

A Royal Felon.

A few days since the public of St. Petersburg saw standing before the bar of a St. Petersburg Court of Justice, Prince Michael Lusignan, a descendant of the former Kings of Cyprus, Jerusalem and Armenia. The family of the Lusignans is one of the oldest of royal origin, and goes back to the twelfth century. It is therefore not to be wondered at that when Prince Lusignan appeared before the Court to answer a charge of forgery, a large audience had gathered together to witness the result. Among those present in the Court was the father of the accused, Prince Louis Lusignan, loud-down with age and sorrow. It was said to look upon the old man, reduced from great wealth to extreme penury, and condemned to witness the disgrace of his family in the person of his only son.

The personal history of the old man is so full of interest that we cannot refrain from giving a few of its main incidents. Prince Louis Lusignan was born in Cyprus, April 19, 1808, and he received from his father an inheritance which amounted to about six million pounds, mostly in money. This fortune had been placed for safe-keeping in the hands of his uncle on the mother's side, Athanasius, Metropolitan of Nicomedia. On Easter Sunday, 1821, Athanasius was arrested by the Turkish Government, and, together with the Patriarch of Constantinople, put to death. The entire fortune of Prince Louis was confiscated, and he himself barely escaped with his life, owing to the exertions of the Spanish Minister in Constantinople, a good friend of the consular members of the British Bible Society then in Turkey. After remaining alone for nearly a year Prince Lusignan went to Athens and entered the Greek service.

In the year 1826 he came to St. Petersburg and offered his services to the Russian Government, and was forthwith enrolled in the Russian army.

First—To receive no pay for the work of discretion for his services.

Second—Not to become a Russian subject.

The conditions were accepted, and Prince Lusignan was assigned to service in one of the regiments with the rank of Captain. Since entering the service the Prince took part in nearly every campaign made by the Russian army. By degrees his means of living became well nigh exhausted, and his sole source of receiving his last farthing from the Turkish Government met with certain obstacles in a few weeks before the war between France and Germany, when Napoleon III., through one of his ministers, offered to use all his influence to recover the property of Lusignan on condition of receiving 12,000,000 francs for his services in case of success. The Prince Lusignan on this occasion received an autograph letter from Napoleon, in which the above-mentioned conditions are referred to. The war with France, however, gave the hero of Sedan something else to think of besides saving the property of the Lusignan family fortune and money arrangements prompted his son to commit the crime of forgery. His case has been found guilty and condemned to exile in the Ural country. The decision of the Court will be submitted to the Czar for his signature. The sole mitigation of the punishment is hoped for.

THE CATHOLIC UNION.—A deputation of the Catholic Union, consisting of the Duke of Norfolk, Lord Petre, Mr. T. Weld Blundell, of Ince, Mr. J. Billington, Q.C., and Mr. John Weld, had an interview with Mr. Bruce to call the attention of the Government to the religious disabilities of Catholics in Ireland, and to urge on the Government the law which deprives these unhappy sufferers of the consolations of religion. The interview is satisfactory, for Mr. Bruce was persuaded, from the facts brought under his notice, that a special statute of an amendment in the law. The Duke of Norfolk, we are glad to see, took the opportunity of impressing upon the attention of the Home Secretary the advisability of the Government having in hand early in the Session, the "Prison Ministers' Bill," which, last session, was passed in the House of Lords. These early measures on the part of the Catholic Union to relieve Catholics from religious disabilities under which they still suffer, and the readiness displayed by Government to redress grievances when stated by those personally cognizant of the facts, in this case, as magistrates in the county where the sufferers in question are detained, augur well for the future of this important agitation. If evidence were necessary, the large audience in the Catholic cause in England at such an association as the Union.—Westminster Gazette, January 4.

DESCRIBING THE TEMPLES.—Some weeks since a writer in that amusing English magazine, Punch, published an article on "Palermo," in which he described the pitiful manner in which the authorities of Palermo treated public charities in the days gained in that city: "Some of them are half ruined, and others have their winding stairs cut away, so that the door is frequently 20 or twenty feet above the level of the street." We find in the Daily Telegraph of December 30th, an account of the laying of a very grand church in the capital of Sicily, that of St. Teresa. The public editor, of which New York might be proud as a cathedral, rich in costly marbles and works of art, is now being converted into a stable for horses, "the altars with their crosses and statues are heaped in dark straw, the grand frescos are ruined, and the beautiful Mosaic pavement broken into fragments by the hoofs of the animals which it was meant to trample on. It is fearful, and fills the eyes of all men who have a spark of religion or moral feeling, with tears of indignation and anger. The makes the forty-eighth church now desecrated in Palermo by "the Italian Government."—Catholic Review.

GOING BACK TO "FORSAY."—Edinburgh, the city of John Knox, requires to be "ever-galled," and Mr. Gall, a member of the Free Presbytery, after "years of anxious and careful experiment," opines that this desirable end has not been attained. Since entering the service the Prince took part in nearly every campaign made by the Russian army. By degrees his means of living became well nigh exhausted, and his sole source of receiving his last farthing from the Turkish Government met with certain obstacles in a few weeks before the war between France and Germany, when Napoleon III., through one of his ministers, offered to use all his influence to recover the property of Lusignan on condition of receiving 12,000,000 francs for his services in case of success. The Prince Lusignan on this occasion received an autograph letter from Napoleon, in which the above-mentioned conditions are referred to. The war with France, however, gave the hero of Sedan something else to think of besides saving the property of the Lusignan family fortune and money arrangements prompted his son to commit the crime of forgery. His case has been found guilty and condemned to exile in the Ural country. The decision of the Court will be submitted to the Czar for his signature. The sole mitigation of the punishment is hoped for.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

CALAVERAS.

The following items are from the Calaveras Chronicle of February 1st: The Twin mine, in Lower Birch Gulch in this county, is now yielding more gold than any other mine in the State with the same milling capacity.

Satisfactory progress is being made in the Hudson mine at Central Hill.

Pfindel & Martin have recently opened a hydraulic claim on Worth's Hill, a short distance below the Junction. Water is brought to the claim in iron pipes, and has a pressure of about two hundred and twenty feet. From one hundred and fifty to two hundred inches of water is used.

A new body of ore has been discovered in the 100 foot south level of the Sanderson mine, and promises to be extensive.

The lower tunnel of the Herzer mine is in 260 feet. No walls in sight. The vein matter is almost black and heavily charged with sulphurets.

The huge body of ore struck in the Lone Star is daily increasing in quantity. There is sufficient good pay ore in sight now to keep a 40 stamp mill running for years.

The Woodland has been started again with fair prospects.

KERN.

The Havilah Miner says one hundred miners can get immediate employment at the Cumberland, and the limited at Bright Star and Summer mines. Some of these mines have absolutely suspended for want of workingmen.

The St. John Company have now attained a depth of five hundred feet on their mine. The lower level shows a body of ore from 40 to seven feet in width. There is now rock enough in sight to run the company's 12-stamp mill for three years. Some of the ore goes over every day in the mine was struck last week in the lower level.

NEVADA.

The Nevada Transcript says: The hoisting works of the Eric mine, situated at South Fork, are completed and work admirably, giving good satisfaction.

The Gresnhorn mine has had a clean-up after putting one hundred and fifty tons of ore through the mill. The amount realized in gold was $3,200.

The stock of the property of the Little York Water and Gravel Mining Company, at Little York, which has been pending for some time past, has been consummated. The purchasers are English capitalists, and the price paid was $800,000.

PLUMAS.

A large amount of work is being done by the Spanish Company. A main working tunnel is being pushed rapidly ahead and will be completed by the last of May. The tunnel is run on the line of the old Mammoth tunnel, is seven feet wide at the bottom, six feet on top and seven feet high. The track is laid in the bottom, and the ore will be hauled in iron cars, by mule power. The new 40-stamp mill will be ready to run by the 1st of May.

SIERRA.

The Mountain Messenger has the following: The North American claim, located at Nusark, are working a large force of men, but there is not room for more. Great improvements have been made about the mine within the past few months. The dirt is now taken out with much less labor and expense than was done heretofore. They have one of the largest pits in this locality, ever seen in Northern Sierra. The late rains have enabled them to wash but a mere trifle compared with what is left.

NEVADA.

The Pioche Record gives the following summary for the week ending January 15th: Work has been resumed in the Meadow Valley under-lay mines, and in still others the forces has been greatly increased. A more healthy tone is manifest in general business. The Raymond & Ely mine is now employing 40 to 50 men, and has engaged to go to work at an early day. The steel wire rope for the engine hoisting is undoubtedly over, and all business interests stand on a more substantial footing. New veins, presenting promising bodies of ore, have lately been struck, and improved machinery may be expected soon to figure on the stock boards.

The Virginia City Enterprise has the following: Superintendents of the mines inform us that at no time during the last five years has the condition of the Comstock been in as good condition below and above the ground, as they are at present, and that during this time the indications for finding the prospects for the future have never been so favorable as they now are. They say, start with us from the Ophir, and briefly note the condition and prospects of the principal mines on the Comstock. The Ophir mine is now in a better condition than it has ever been, and the Consolidated Virginia that pay rock will soon be found in it are more favorable than they have been for the past five years. The Gould & Curry, on several levels, while one year ago there was not a pound of quartz in sight in the mine.

Next we come to the Consolidated Virginia. One year ago a little work had been done in this mine, and so little was generally known about it, that the stock was considered valueless, and was to be had by "on a margin." Now we have reliable reports to the effect that they have lately made some handsome developments, and the stock stands as well in the estimation of operators as any stock called by the San Francisco Board of Brokers.

With regard to the Gould & Curry and Savage mines, we do not think it necessary to say that they are in better condition and have more favorable prospects than they had a year ago.

We have reliable information that a good body of ore has been struck lately on or near the Hale & Norcross and Chollar boundary line, which looks better than anything found in either of these mines during the past two years.

The Imperial and Empire Mill have developed fine bodies of ore during the past six or eight months, and nothing but lack of necessary machinery has prevented them from taking out and sending to mill ore, if they wish to do so.

The Crown Point and Belcher mines probably never had more ore, of a high grade, in sight than they have to-day. The latter resumed payment of dividends ($5 per share) this month, and we have been informed that the Crown Point will resume payment of dividends in February.

One year ago the overwork at their new works, had "nothing but a hole in the ground." Now they have one of the best mills on the Comstock, nearly 900 feet deep, and a prospecting drift in over 500 feet on their 700-foot level. They have lately put in place three large new hoisting and other new machinery, all of which is stamped to be superior in its line of machinery in the State of Nevada. The indications in this mine for soon striking the body of Crown Point and Belcher body of ore are said to be excellent.

The work done in the Caledonia, Kentucky, Bullionite Consolidated, Justice and Silver Hill, during the past year, together with favorable developments that have been made, ought to have increased the intrinsic value of these mines at least one hundred per cent. during the time.

In St. Louis the cost of living at ordinary eating-houses is nearly double what it is in San Francisco. This may seem surprising, but nevertheless less it is true. There are comparatively few restaurants, and those are generally of a poor sort, and charge high. A breakfast of ordinary beefsteak, potatoes, bread, butter and coffee, costs fifty cents; here it would not be more than twenty-five cents at a house of the same class, and would be better in quality and greater in quantity.

Why Endure What is Curable?

"What can't be cured must be endured," say the proverb; but indigestion can be cured, and the reliefs it is the merest stupidity to endure it. Dyspeptics have certainly a right to continue dyspeptics to the end of their days if they choose, but as it is not supposed that any rational being prefers physical torment to physical comfort, the presumption is that if all sufferers from indigestion were convinced that an absolutely infallible remedy for it existed, they would with non-accord resort to it. We must, therefore, assume that the reason why HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS is not used by all dyspeptics is that they have not been informed of its merits. It is a well-established fact that during the whole of that time it has never failed to afford prompt and entire relief to any person afflicted with any of dietary rules, and is unrivalled and supreme as a remedy for disorders of the stomach, liver, bowels and kidneys. Hundreds of instances have cured within the last few months, which have been published in the newspapers, and it should be remembered that weakness of the digestive organs is the first symptom of the disease, and that the early stages of nervous debility, spasms, palpitation of the heart, rush of blood to the head, nausea, vertigo and sleeplessness are among its concomitants and results; and that the first step to its manifestation is a specific, acts first upon the stomach, and through the stomach upon the nervous and nervous centers, and the bowels, its general effect being always genial and

THE RED AGAINST THE GREEN.

A Lunacy Proviso was a Saxon proud,
And ever the seas sailed he!
And he and the Irish were not well
That he tried to sound their funeral knell,
And his is the ash he reaps to-day
In the bosoms of the brave and free!

His own convictions up, and went hook and scrip,
All according in idolatries,
He pushed the Celt, shut even bed slaves—
Robbed up the bosses of the fallow brows;
Then he'd be a Christian man, and pray
For a scholar profound was he.

The "best of Irishmen" he ought to be—
The "best Irishman" born he,
And he'd spoken from the Emerald isle with grace,
And heighten fame from the breast he bore,
And he'd been hailed the carnage roar,
For a Christian man was he.

For dead King Rial and his virgin gal
Is never to be forgotten,
Their memories are dear to Victorian hearts,
Who sympathize, condone and plunderers towns,
Like Christians, and Christians alone.
For this was he in remedies.

A smooth true blue, right royal and true,
He's ever the same to me,
From the misty shores to the glorious West,
The same old Saxon, and Christian to boot,
That magic motion right, both proof and test,
In the nineteenth century.

Lo! Father Tom dropped down like a bomb,
And startled him Pacificist;
He leaned to the victim his varnished tale,
Then he'd down on the scandal and hid,
And made the grand historian quail,
For such a monk was he.

"Ah, let us feel, for that time is past,"
Quoth Father Tom, quoth he,
In a faithful picture this great priest drew
Of the Irish race, and the sorrows grew,
And closely proved that he also knew
Of Irish affairs was he.

Poor Erin smiled on her gifted child,
Through the tears that welled for many,
She brought the brilliant Froude to bay—
She had him up in her Court of Law,
And left him never a prop to stay
For his wonderful tales of woe.

So the tale he told lacked the ring of pure gold,
Though polished and fine was he,
For Ireland's son and Ireland's name,
Were proved full dear on the scroll of fame,
And a voice was heard in the eagle's scream,
That "Erin's free at last!"

Poor Froude, poor Froude, he's a sorry dog,
Poor Father Tom, poor he,
Poor Father Tom, quoth he,
Poor Father Tom, quoth he,
And closely proved that he also knew
Of Irish affairs was he.

THE GALLA.

A fragrant flower, pure and sweet,
Whose beauty is unequaled by birth
Where Zion's stream pour forth
Its crystal waters to the earth.

A monthly fair, and white as snow
Is the Galla, which blooms bright
Where the Virgin Mary dwells
In the realms of light.

Then let us gather that flower,
And bring it to the altar of God,
And offer it to the Virgin Mary
Who is the mother of God.

Episcopalian Treatment.

Every horse-owner is desirous to have information he can possess relative to treatment of the diseases of horses now prevailing in this State, we be advice and experience of G. Scott, mbus, Ohio, who writes to the St. Republican as follows:

Give a handful of ts, or the equivalent of flax seed ny two or three times a day, and endeavor to keep the bowels in good condition. Rub the legs of the horse well out, where water where he can have access to it night. Many horses are so affected by the change of water that they refuse before drinking, and some stables- have changed the water-bucket so often that the animals have to drink out of the bucket, which will do no

IRELAND.

The Irish Land Question.

The signs thicken of a renewed agitation for fixity of tenure and valuation rents as the only satisfactory remedies for the ills of the Irish agricultural community. Indeed, the agitation may be said to be already an established fact. North, south, east and west Tenant Defense Associations modeled, on the Kildare organization, are daily springing into existence, and everywhere great dissatisfaction with the Gladstone Act is loudly and even angrily expressed. In the west or Ulster the case is the north the establishment of simple fixity of tenure has been demanded for the whole of Ireland, and the demand has been echoed not only in Limerick and other counties where landlord opposition is most grievously felt, but even in such places as Dublin, where the farmers—if at least we may judge from the apathy and indifference with which they have hitherto treated every attempt to reform the land laws of the country—have been exceptionally well treated. Shortly the farmers of the south will speak out formally and with one voice on the subject. A conference of the various Farmers' Clubs of Munster has been summoned to meet in Cork next week, and will be attended by, amongst others, several members of Parliament. The organs of the landlord party are very wroth with the farmers for getting up this "fresh attack on the rights of property;" but those organs do not see—or they carefully ignore the fact—that the farmers are themselves the landlords. Every day landlord tricks against tenant-right are reported from Ulster. From Tipperary this week we have news that several ejectments have been brought against perfectly solvent tenants. Talbot Crosbie's ejectments, three or four were tried the other day in Tralee, and would have all, as one of them was, stamped with the sanction of the law, but for a merely technical mistake which can be easily avoided next Quarter Sessions. Elsewhere we hear of documents resembling the Antwerp "Loyalty Pledge," which the tenants of Ireland are getting ready for the liveliest apprehension.—Nation, January 11.

Working for Nothing.

On Wednesday the North Dublin Board of Guardians voted to their clerk one hundred dollars as compensation for his services in connection with the New Jury Act.

Naturally enough—since the preparation of jury lists is not a matter connected in any way with the administration of the Poor Laws—the Board protested strongly against being compelled to make such an addition, which ought to be rather borne by the Imperial Treasury; and on the same day a deputation which waited on the Chief Secretary for Ireland in reference this very subject, showed Lord Hartington that the clerks of Unions were paid out of the poor rates for several other duties totally unconnected with their primary and proper occupation, and partaking of an Imperial rather than a local character. Most if not all the Irish Poor Law Boards have memorialized on this occasion, and the demand was as reasonable as it was simple—that the Imperial fund should be wholly relieved of the charges in question, and that half the cost of all supernumerary assistance shall be borne by the Consolidated Fund. The reply of the Marquis of Hartington was that the Freeman has remarked, a strong argument in favor of Home Rule. He virtually if not expressly admitted that there was a grievance to be removed, but left the Board to wait until Parliament was satisfied on the whole subject of local taxation! Of course, he would go by way of the time the Government would take the matter into their serious consideration;" where, we may just observe, it has been for a considerable time already and is likely to remain for a good while longer.—Nation, January 11.

The Belmez Riots.

The Government will not appoint a Commission to inquire into the cause of the Belmez riots. They were asked to do so by the Corporation of the city, but the good, kind folk think that inquiry would now revive ill-will and party feeling in the North; and, of course, the last thing they would think of doing is to contribute to the elements of national dissension in Ireland. Besides, they have got "fresh the officers of the Crown, both civil and military," all the information they deem requisite on the subject. This latter reason will appear to most Irishmen much more forcible than the first one. Nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of our fellow-countrymen are firmly convinced that the Castle folk are rather pleased than otherwise by the mournful fact of an outrage—and outrages like that are quite plainly that no Commission could make it more evident than it is at present in the Orangeism were the prime movers in the disturbances in question.—Dublin Nation, January 11.

Hair.

From the Roscommon Messenger we learn that the Roscommon branch of the Home Government Association is cordially cooperating with the present body of the Irish Party in the matter of the Special Fund. At a recent meeting it voted a sum of money in aid of this fund, and at the same meeting no indifferent local gentlemen—Mr. J. D. McDermott, J. P., and Mr. Farrell Mellon, M.—were admitted members. This branch is now, we believe, one of the most powerful in the three Kingdoms, and what we certain that if it continues to exhibit the same energy and devotion to the national cause by which its action has been so far characterized, it will achieve important and gratifying results at the general election, which is now fast approaching.—Nation January 11.

The Nettywood Tragedy.

The Holycross tragedy occupies yets large share of public attention, and will probably continue to do so for some time longer.

About ten persons—all but one women—are now in custody on various charges connected with the murder, and those friends Charlotte Rea, who from the first had been suspected, as well as her father, Mary Rea, to be a guilty party, and for whom the police searched in vain for five days. At the resumption of the Coroner's inquiry Mr. McMordie, solicitor for Mary Rea, protested strongly against the privacy of certain magisterial investigations in the case, and applied for the removal against the magistrate who presided —his object being, he said, to ascertain exactly what had transpired. The application was refused.—Nation, January 11.

Well-earned Honor.

Honors and distinctions are now-a-days, it must be confessed, conferred too often without regard to the question whether they are deserved; but those bestowed a few days ago by the Holy Father on Mr. John O. Kenyon and Mr. Keyes O'Clery, of the League of St. Sebastian, do not come under the chronic category. Mr. Kenyon and Mr. O'Clery both proved themselves at the close of Rome intrepid defenders of the pastoral of new No-Popery laws threatened. Father the Holy Father did not go, except to remind the Imperial Government of the fact that Catholicism is the religion of science sake, and that it is still now the only creed in order of things in Germany may happen—a probable danger. The word enemy of the German Empire is the man who has the credit with the world of being the foremost workman in its erection. The best hope for its preservation and for the stamping out of the Socialist and Red Republican heresies now spreading so fearfully in the Crown Prince and his Suave lies in the almost unanimity of Bismarck's persecuting policy. Count Eulenburg stated in the Prussian House of Commons a few days ago that the retirement of Prince Bismarck from the Prussian Premiership does not imply a change of the Government policy. That may be true, speaking generally, as the Count did; but we believe it is not true if it meant to apply to the relations of the State with the Church. On such occasions Ministers must be assumed to speak exactly what they intend or what they know. Their rule is to give a rose but to Cabinet quarrels. A little time will remove all doubts upon the subject, and show what measures respecting the Catholic Church in the Empire the Government meant to submit for the consideration of the Prussian Legislature.—Weekly Register, January 11.

ITALY.

Rome.

It is not in Germany alone that the recent Allocution of the Holy Father has thickened the enemies of the Church. We have not ceased to contradict the reports circulated continuously by the anti-Catholic press in this country on the subject of the Allocution fell throughout Italy, as they alleged, and especially in Rome, at the séance of the Eternal City and the extinction of the Papal sovereignty of the Pope by the Piedmontese usurper. We have contradicted these mendacious and malicious reports in the strongest terms over and over again, and every respectable and competent writer has done the same. In addition, therefore, to these contradictions, we have pleasure in giving the following extract from a letter of the Rome correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, dated January 4th:

"The Allocution of the Holy Father has produced no effect whatever in Rome. The people are not even aware that it has been delivered. Those who read it are astonished at the violence of the language, and at the fact that the Pope should have thought it necessary to address the Catholic world in such terms. The Romans are not in the habit of reading the speeches of the Pope, and the Allocution has not been translated into Italian. Those who have read it in the original Latin

THE "AMERICAN" PROTESTANT ASSOCIATION.

We are confident that the exposé of the so-called "American" Protestant Association, which we published last week, has done a great deal of good. If there were any Irish Catholics in San Francisco weak enough to believe their American-born fellow-citizens capable of entering into a conspiracy to deprive them of their political rights, it must have undeceived them. It is in the nature of most men to form an exaggerated idea of hidden dangers, and when the city newspapers teemed with accounts of this anti-Catholic organization, of course the general impression was that an immense, highly Protestant individuals are not only not Americans, but are even subjects of a nation hostile to the Republic.

These contemptible conspirators meet in secret for the good and sufficient reason that their deeds are not such as will bear the light, and also because they expect to be able to hide from the public their paucity of numbers and their contemptible insignificance. They can get paragraphs inserted in the papers and circulate rumors on the street tending to create the impression that there is a most powerful and widespread organization; but if you look at the records, a glance at their high-toned "solon mistress," dispell all such notions, and is sufficient to move both gods and men to laughter. We hope that the exposé which we have been so fortunately instrumental in giving will deal a death-blow to this pernicious organization. Hereafter no respectable man, no man of reputable antecedents, should be prevailed upon to join it, as a few no doubt have been, on the plea that it is simply a benevolent association, because its evil and dangerous character has been made manifest. In a short time it will die out altogether, and leave behind only the odors of bigotry and whisky mixed.

UNION AMONG IRISHMEN.

The idea generally entertained of Ireland by foreigners is that it is an island the inhabitants of which are incessantly quarreling about religion. This judgment is, of course, founded upon English authorities because it is part of the policy of our "masters" to represent to the world as a people so utterly given over to feuding and intolerance as to be incapable of self-government. But, like most of the assertions concerning us made by Anglo-Saxon writers, this is destitute of any foundation in truth. A calm investigation will prove that, taking into consideration all the efforts made by alien rulers to create and foster religious dissensions, the Irish are as united and tolerant a race as can be found on the surface of the habitable globe. The letter which was published last week, written by a Protestant gentleman, a Mr. Wade, in one of the New York papers, contained evidence that it would be impossible to refute, in favor of our assertion. According to him the Irish Catholics are so kindly disposed towards their brethren who are not of their ancient faith, so willing to unite with them in brotherly feeling, that, even when in a largely preponderating majority, they voluntarily surrender to them a fair share of the civic and municipal governments. In Dublin, Cork, Limerick, Galway, Kilkenny, Wexford and other towns and cities, the Catholic voters are so numerous that, if they were actuated by the spirit of exclusiveness often charged against them, a purely Catholic or conservative could ever be elected to any office in the bestowal of the people. But, unless the issue is directly forced upon them by the notorious bigotry of the other parties, they never make religion a test of eligibility either to Parliament or to the Municipal Chamber. Hence Protestants are frequently chosen as representatives by the Catholic majorities in Catholic constituencies in the country, and it often happens that they are even preferred to adherents of the old creed when they make profession of liberal views and democratic principles. The memorable Meath election, when the venerable patriot JOHN MARTIN, a staunch Presbyterian, defeated the son of an extremely popular and most influential Catholic nobleman, may be taken as an example of this.

The general rule seems to be that wherever the Catholic voters are the stronger party, there order, harmony and kindly toleration prevail. It was a great misfortune that he cannot say as much for the Protestant section of the community. There is not, we believe, on record a single instance of a constituency having the unenviable appreciable majority of Protestant voters electing an independent or liberal Catholic. The difference of power between the two parties in Belfast is very small; indeed, we believe if our coreligionists acted as a united body they would turn the scales in their own favor; yet the Khan of Khiva would stand a better chance of being elected President of the United States than a "mere Papist" would of being returned to Parliament as member for the city we have named. On the other hand, the difference between the two parties in Cork is immense, the Protestants being but an insignificant minority; yet time out of mind the Corkmen have been represented in the House of Commons by Anglicans and Dissenters. The moral to be drawn from this contrast is so obvious that we need say nothing about it, but leave it altogether to our readers. So bigotry and religious animosities now only linger in the strongholds of Orangeism; and even from them it is rapidly disappearing, being driven away by the spread of a glorious feeling of charity and Christian brotherhood. The Home Rule movement, if it should never attain the object for which it was organized, will be entitled to the eternal gratitude of the Irish people for the blows it has dealt at fanaticism, and the good it has achieved in bringing about a national alliance between all denominations. Already we can see in Ireland the cheering spectacle of a Catholic priest and a Protestant professor travelling together through the length and breadth of the country, teaching the millions the glorious creed of national independence.

THE ORIGIS IN SPAIN.

The worthless Savoyard who was, by the action of a few intriguing politicians, foisted upon the Spaniards as a King, has found his position an uncomfortable one and abdicated. AMADEO the First, and Last, could never make himself liked by the people, who would not forgive that he was the son of the despoiler of the Pope, and was himself an enemy to the Church. From the unlucky day he mounted the throne until the fortunate day he left it, his Government did nothing but struggle with difficulties, which grew greater instead of becoming less. A speedy termination of his reign, either violent or peaceable, was plainly inevitable; and the Italian has shown more discretion than we gave him credit for by voluntarily retiring into private life. We give the Spaniards much praise for the manner in which they have treated the usurper; and they deserve congratulation upon the fact that they have got rid of him without passing through the ordeal of bloodshed. The Cortes, the Chamber of Representatives, have proclaimed a Republic, the resolution to do so having been carried by an immense majority. But it seems to us that these worthy gentlemen have exceeded their constitutional and legitimate powers. They were not elected to shape the form of Government, but to legislate for the country under the authority of a form of Government already in existence; and they have no more right to make Spain a Republic than Congress would have to turn the United States into an Empire. It remains to be seen whether the people will indorse the action of their representatives as the act of some republicans, in accordance with the vote. There are now three parties in the field struggling for power—the republicans, with CASTELLAR at their head; the Alphonsists, who wish to put the son of Queen Isabella on the throne, and the Carlists, who are the adherents of the legitimate sovereign, Don CARLOS. The republicans have, or rather seem to have, a majority of the Cortes, on their side; but we doubt whether they have even a respectable minority of the people.

A few theoretical politicians may change their whole code of principles in a day, but it requires a very long time indeed to destroy the traditions and warp the sympathies of a nation. The Alphonsists are undoubtedly strong, and sympathies nearly all the Spaniards who have been outraged by the infamous calumnies heaped upon their late queen by mendacious writers, and who remember with affection the patriotism, generosity and greatness of heart which distinguished her. The Carlists are those who bear in mind that the Spanish law of succession was violated in order to put Isabella on the throne, and who, therefore, will not acknowledge any other than Don CARLOS as their rightful ruler. The larger portion of the respectable and order-loving classes—the men who have any stake in the country—are partisans of this claimant, as are also the clergy almost without an exception. There cannot be a reasonable doubt that if Don CARLOS succeeds in getting into power he will do much to promote the prosperity and ensure the glory of his native land. As a general rule, Americans extend their sympathies to that party which promises to establish republican institutions; but this is done thoughtlessly and without proper knowledge of the circumstances of the case. There are republicans and republicans. We have yet to find a single prominent man among all those crying for democratic governments in Europe, in place of the existing empires and monarchies, who would be satisfied with republicanism as we have it in this country. The simple truth is, they are all socialists of a more or less pronounced type, and the republics they are desirous of founding would resemble that which MARAT, ROBESPIERRE & Co. effectually destroyed when he forced his way into Paris in 1871. The principal basis of their constitution is the enthronement of Atheism in high places, and the destruction of the Church. The toleration they talk so loudly about is like that announced in Ireland by OLIVER CROMWELL, who declared that he had not the least desire in the world to interfere with any man's religion, but if religion implied going to Mass, he, for his part, would allow no such thing! We should be happy to learn that the Spanish "republicans" were of a different stamp, but we have as yet seen no proof of it.

DEATH OF A DISTINGUISHED IRISH-AMERICAN.

Our Eastern contemporaries just to hand devote considerable space to highly eulogistic obituary notices of Hon. WILLIAM CASSIDY, editor and chief proprietor of the Albany Argus, who died in that city, his native place, on the night of January 23d. And certainly it must be acknowledged that great indeed would be the praise which could surpass the merits of the deceased gentleman, for in every relation of life he won the esteem of all who had the happiness of his acquaintance. His family have been connected with the Capital of New York State for nearly a hundred years, his grandparents having been among the first Irish Catholics that ever settled there. His father, Mr. JOHN CASSIDY, was a man of much intellectual power, and was in his day a very prominent and influential politician. WILLIAM inherited his ability in a high degree, and ordered more refined and polished by the very best education procurable in his native colonies. He, however, did not monopolize all the genius of the brilliant Cassidy family, inasmuch as every one of his brothers and sisters, and they were numerous beyond the average, gave tokens of possessing no small share of it. He was one of his sisters who wrote the address presented to the illustrious LAFAYETTE when he visited these shores for the last time. Mr. CASSIDY was brought up to the law, and entered the office of JUDGE MCGOWAN and DANIEL D. BURNS with the intention of completing his studies; but he soon found out that such a line of life was not congenial to him, and having considerable literary taste, he took almost instinctively to journalistic writing. The Boston Pilot gives the following succinct account of his career as a newspaper editor and writer:

> In 1840-41 he wrote political articles for two Albany papers of little note—the Daily Mail and "Fish Dealer"—both opposed to the Democratic party. In December, 1841, he started the Albany Daily Times on the basis of the "Fish Dealer," in 1843, by merging the two papers. The Daily Times was a success, and obtained some notoriety as the Government Printer for the State of New York. Mr. Cassidy was also the establishment of the paper, and soon afterwards the Albany Evening Journal, which was the property of Thurlow Weed, was placed in the hands of Mr. James M. Price. Mr. Price died, and Mr. Cassidy and Van Dyck & Cassidy, and finally became the editor. Mr. French died, and Mr. Cassidy left New York, took his place in the firm, which became Van Dyck & Cassidy. The paper was enlarged and gradually surpassed the old "Argus," which had been established in 1813, as the Democratic organ of the State. Mr. Cranwell retired from the "Argus," it was sold, and Mr. Cassidy became the editor of that paper, with Mr. Cassidy. After eight or nine years Mr. Cassidy retired from the Argus, and became the editor and proprietor of the Democratic town paper and in 1854 the Argus—Mr. Cassidy's old paper—was sold to Mr. Weed, and on the 1st of January, 1855, appeared under the name of the "Atlas and Argus." Mr. Cassidy retired, and the firm became Weed, Parsons & Cassidy. Eventually a joint-stock company was formed, and the name of the "Atlas" was dropped, and the paper published as the "Argus" by the Argus Association, Mr. Cassidy, however, remaining as editor. He was also for a time editor of the Albany Evening Journal.

Mr. CASSIDY was a man of vigorous constitution and powerful frame, and looked as though destined to out-live the term of years usually allotted to man; yet, assailed by an illness that at first was not deemed of much consequence, he died on the 23d of January, at the comparatively early age of fifty-eight years. Mr. CASSIDY was a staunch firm and faithful adherent of the ancient faith, and from early manhood until the close of his days made it a labor of love to instruct the youth of the native city in the truths of religion. He meditated a visit to this coast, and not long before his death wrote to a friend of his residing here, a letter which, with the following sentence, which reads as though he had at the time a presentiment of his approaching end. "If it is possible," he wrote, "that I may yet view the wonders of the Pacific Coast and renew old friendships I made in Paris before I put off for that unknown yet still more pacific shore to which all the streams of life flow. Meanwhile, let our 'photos' interchange a visit." We cannot conclude this too brief sketch of Mr. CASSIDY more appropriately than by quoting the remarks made by Mr. VAN BUREN before the Common Council Chamber in Albany, when the President, Mr. SILLIMAN, in a most touching and eloquent speech informed the gentlemen present of his decease:

> I have prepared some resolutions in relation to this sad event. It has very rarely been my lot, in the course of my life, outside of his own kindred, who had the privilege of knowing him more intimately than I did. He was my friend in his family, and he was then my friend in his office. I have been familiar with Mr. Cassidy for nine years—since I first came to Albany—and I have never known a man who was more universally esteemed in every way—in his family, in his office, in the community, and in the council; and he was a man of unpassing abilities, and of surpassingly pure, character. I have known no man whose character I regard to be of a higher order. And his fellow men could not be excelled; his integrity as a lawyer in his family was as perfect as that the most perfect woman could ever be. His wife and family as a husband and father, and his neighbors as a neighbor from one end of the city to the other could tell the moment their eyes lighted upon him that it was Mr. Cassidy's kind and sincere face which met it. But few knew, except those who have been with him for the last few years, of the great degree of power he possessed over himself. Did I shall not dilate upon his many merits, and I do not feel able to offer any more words of eulogy. I therefore shall support with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Commissioners do adjourn in token of respect for that eminent citizen, WILLIAM CASSIDY, who, in a body, attend his funeral in a body.

Resolved, That the usual resolutions, appropriately engraved, and signed by the Chairman of this Board, be forwarded to the family.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY, 1873.

Election of Orator and Poet—Appointment of Committees.

The Convention of Irish societies to make arrangements for the due celebration of St. Patrick's Day, resumed its deliberations Sunday afternoon at Irish-American Hall, the President, Mr. John Kenealy, in the chair. While the roll was being called, Mr. T. P. Wall announced that himself and colleagues, Messrs. Butler, Sullivan and Gilmore, representing the Ancient Order of Hibernians, No. 4, would withdraw from the Convention. The Convention, however, wisely refused to accept their resignation, as the valuable services of these gentlemen will still be retained in the councils.

St. Mary's Temperance, Benevolent and Library Association sent James J. Phelan, P. Rafferty, M. J. McKenna and John Reardon as delegates; Bourke and Lolly Club, I. C., P. Durgan, vice F. Mahon, resigned; Company A, Legion of St. Patrick, Sergeants W. Moore and John Holland, vice James Ryan and Nicholas Shire.

P. J. Tannian nominated Rev. Father Gibney, pastor of St. Peter's Church, for Orator of the Day; and John Hanvill, Esq., and Capt. P. J. Kain having declined, the Secretary cast the ballot for Father Gibney.

Daniel Cronin nominated P. H. Walsh, Wm. N. Plunkett and James M. Murphy, were proposed as candidates for Poet of the Day; but the three latter gentlemen having declined, Mr. O'Connell was chosen by acclamation. Mr. O'Connell has, however, declined the position of Poet.

Mr. Sullivan, of Company A, moved that Father Gibney be requested to write a poem for the occasion. Carried.

Mr. Cassidy, Secretary of the Legion, said he could not promise anything in the shape of poetry, but he was getting worse, but he was getting worse, but he was getting worse every day. Laughter.

Mr. Cassidy, however, promised to write a prose oration, and the same was received with applause

THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

"On my honor, Master Dudley, I know not why thou shouldst distrust my loyalty. I am the servant of the king: I have both given and taken hard blows under his banner; against whom have I ever fought if not against his enemies? God forbid that my noble banderaor should ever need the service of my sword against our common Sovereign; but, by your hand, Master Dudley, this is some calumny of the Earl spread by his and the Lord Thomas' enemies. I never heard of other design among either them or their retainers, than to support the royal authority or defend themselves against their private enemies; and I freely promise thee I will not strike a stroke on their behalf in any other quarrel."

"It is enough," said the merchant. "I trust to thine own candor and generosity; there is that in my heart which tells me thou will not deceive me."

"A man overwhelmed with obligations cannot make his promises with as bad a grace as his acknowledgments; I can but say, Master Dudley, I thank thee, and will do my best to show myself not unworthy thy good opinion."

"And that is all I ask," cried Dudley; "I am now very well satisfied in all things. Go to my daughter, Sir John, and settle what day you please to end the wooing. God bless them both!" he exclaimed, as the knight disappeared down the green alley which led to the orchard; and God be praised also that we found fully given me two such children to bless! Surely my heart should be at ease at last. There are two new desires come to me in this world happy! all around me is pleasant and cheerful—strange! I have not marked the singing of the birds for many a year until to-day! Ah, Paul Dudley, what has been thine dreaming of late long, not to know what a comfort thou hadst at hand in the sunny walks of thine own garden! By my faith, I feel young. I cannot tell how. What need have I for a staff?—le there, thou bast companion!" and he cast away his gold-headed cane, and walked up and down, smoothing the gray locks from his forehead and turning up his face to the breeze with a long-unwonted sense of buoyant enjoyment.

The tramp of horses sounding from the street roused Dudley from a train of happier anticipations than had perhaps occupied his thoughts since the eve of his own nuptials; but ere he had inquired who were the new comers, his child and destined son-in-law were upon him.

"Oh, my dearest father," cried Ellen, as he folded her fondly in his arms, "how can we thank thee for all thy goodness?" and she hid her blushing face on his breast.

"Love each other, my children," cried the happy old man, "love each other, and I ask 'will repaid!'" So saying he joined their hands and blessed them fervently.

It was true before, as Paul Dudley was thus ratifying his approval of his daughter's marriage, that an armed man advanced from the house towards the arbor, in front of which they stood. Whether it was that his aspect was habitually forbidding, or that he disliked his present errand, the stranger wore a black look from the moment he entered the garden: but when, on turning into the walk that gave him a full view of the scene before the summer-house, he caught the first glance of Ellen Dudley in the arms of another, and her father standing by, he stopped for a moment, and drew back as if his eyes had been blasted—grifping to his dagger, and actually reeling. His a man stunned by a heavy blow. It is remarkable, however, he recovered himself: his hand sild down from his belt, and his brow relaxed into a comparative composure; and, still, he advanced, there was a cloud on his dark features and an equality in his step that told of the recent fit of passion. When Dudley saw him coming towards them, he advanced to meet him, although, from the evident design that marked his manner, it was plainly more for the sake of taking him aside, and warning off the bride and lady, than for any wish to show him a marked courtesy.

"Master Pares," said he, "I bid the a good morrow; hast thou any commands for me?"

"I come, Master Dudley," replied the ominous stranger, "on an errand that will not much please thy love for me. I bear a packet for the hands of yonder knight, whom I have sought in vain at guard-room and barbican, and now find toying with fair damsels in thy arbor. I have besides a message, by word of mouth, for Sir John Talbot."

"Ah, Master Pares," said the merchant, "thou art the man to do thy errand, without scruple for place or time. But go on, man; give the knight thy letter, and say what thou hast to say; for, though I be hurried, yet I would have thee take a cup of wine with me before thou goest, till I call these of some danger to thy friends that it behoves thee to know."

"I think thou, Master Dudley," said Pares, "that no wise shall cross my lips to-day until my lord the Lord Deputy's despatches be assoiled look to themselves."

With this churlish answer on his lips, he advanced to the knight, and said: "I have sought thee in vain, Sir John, both at Newgate and at the Castle; my commission I would not have broken in on thy privacy here had my orders not been so urgent as they are. The Lord Thomas Fitzgerald commands him to thee, and sends thee for thy perusal this letter, which Sir John de la Hyde had this morning of him to whom it is addressed—a friar, whose friend writes from London, as thou mayest read."

As Pares spoke, his eyes were fixed on Sir John Talbot with an expression of mixed malignity and triumph. The knight bent a fixed glance on him, in return, as he took the packet from his hands; but was soon too deeply interested in its contents to care whether his angry rival scowled or not upon him. He scarcely had he read half through the first page when the color fled from his cheeks, and large drops of perspiration burst out over his forehead. "Pares!" he cried, and grasped a moment for utterance; "this is the blood royal—look to his brow, he sicened the messenger fiercely by the arm—"Pares! by heaven, if I thought you were here to triumph over my ruin, I would send thy soul to hell at my dagger's point!"

"I am here to do my duty, Sir John Talbot," replied Pares subduing a coarse laugh of fear into a hoarse cough; "I know how much he enjoyed the agony of his friend; that duty done, I want to know whether I am to be prepared to do this?"

"Upon at least, insult never report me!" cried Talbot. "Leave me; I know what thou wouldst say; I will be with Lord Thomas before you."

"As hour, Sir John! My lord did not expect to find his friends so slack at his pleas."

"Curse, leave me. You have your errand; you see me ruined. If there be a heart in your breast, may not here to torture me! If you love your life, Christopher Pares, go!—I will follow you."

Pares's eye glanced for a moment to the arbor, where Ellen Dudley had sunk, pale as ashes, on a seat; but, at a motion of the knight's hand to his dagger, accompanying a fiercer repetition of the command to withdraw, he turned sullenly on his heel and retired. Talbot's energy, before which the ignoble nature of Pares had thus quailed, deserted him as he turned to the arbor, where Ellen Dudley, with a beating heart, awaited the issue of their ominous conference. Her rose in alarm as he entered. "Thou art pale, Sir John; thy hands are cold as ice. Mother of Mercy! what has the wretch done to make thee look so ghastly?"

"Ellen, I am a ruined man! They have murdered the Earl."

"Who have murdered? What earl? For pity's sake, do not look so!"

"The King has murdered the Earl of Kildare, Ellen; and Lord Thomas basbas sent to let me know."

She laid her hands on his, which was clutched and convulsively pressed on his knee. "Oh, Sir, John," she said, "believe me how well I feel for thy afflicting! but take comfort; it pains my heart to see thee grieve so sorely; perhaps this news may be untrue."

"No, no, Ellen; it is all too true; it has been too long and too deeply planned to leave room for chance of failure when the blow was to be struck. The letter is positive; Kildare was beheaded in the Tower on St. Seithin's eve."

"Alas, what had they against him? Was he not ever a loyal subject of the King?"

"Treason, Ellen; they charged him with treason, which she best could no more contrive than it could malice or untruth. But I cannot talk of this now; and my soul is crave for vengeance that I may not think of it."

"Dear Sir John," said Ellen, "I feel, and from my heart I deplore, this misfortune; but do not, I beseech you, look so despairingly: you have two new dearest to me in this world happy! all around me is pleasant and cheerful—strange! I have not marked the singing of the birds for many a year until to-day! Ah, Paul Dudley, what has been thine dreaming of late long, not to know what a comfort thou hadst at hand in the sunny walks of thine own garden! By my faith, I feel young. I cannot tell how. What need have I for a staff?—le there, thou bast companion!" and he cast away his gold-headed cane, and walked up and down, smoothing the gray locks from his forehead and turning up his face to the breeze with a long-unwonted sense of buoyant enjoyment.

"If I have done you wrong, Ellen, you are the truest hearted, but alas, the most hapless maiden that ever clung to man in his misfortunes! You had no cause to whom to look for your fidelity. Yet I call God to witness that nothing short of this would have driven me here to triumph over my ruin, I would send thy soul to hell at my dagger's point!"

"I have here to do my duty, Sir John Talbot," replied Pares subduing a coarse laugh of fear into a hoarse cough; "I know how much he enjoyed the agony of his friend; that duty done, I want to know whether I am to be prepared to do this."

"Upon at least, insult never report me!" cried Talbot. "Leave me; I know what thou wouldst say; I will be with Lord Thomas before you."

"Curse, leave me. You have your revenge; you see me ruined. If there be a heart in your breast, may not here to torture me! If you love your life, Christopher Pares, go!—I will follow you."

Pares's eye glanced for a moment to the

this madness, to this fearful and dishonorable end."

"May God have pity on me," cried Talbot; "this is a sore trial to put a man's heart to!"

"Give the word to mount," cried Pares, who had stood silent through the scene, but now spoke loudly and scornfully. "What answer shall I bear to Lord Thomas, Sir John Talbot? Shall I say that you refuse to join?"

"You shall bear no base account of me to-day!" cried the unhappy gentleman, and at once mastering himself with a clear look at the wretched two he had left behind, hurried to the court-yard, where a wood stood ready saddled for him.

Talbot mounted in the silence of rage and sorrow, and, as the troop wheeled out of the court-yard and turned up to the Dame's Gate, struck his horse fiercely with the spur and dashed out in front. He could not bear the eyes of those around him, for his own were swimming in grief and indignation. When he reached Castle street he was so far in advance of the company that he found himself obliged to pull up until he should learn which way they intended to take. He looked up and down the busy thoroughfare before him, all astir with the bustle of secure prosperity; stalls, shops and warehouses on the one hand and on the other teeming with a peaceful and industrious race, toiling on in happy ignorance of the impending calamities which he was even then lending his aid to hasten, and for a moment his heart failed him; but as he looked up at the fortress, and saw on the brow of the barbican the sharp outline of the spikes on which the heads of the dead were bleaching in the blue sky, he thought, with a shudder and a thrill of anguish, of his own friend's kindly features plotted with blood from the block, and exposed to the insults of the rabble and the birds of air, of London, and the thirst for revenge which then seized his whole soul, consumed whatever lingering affection or kindly allegiance might have been received by his first contemplation of the peaceful security around him.

By this time Pares was again by his side, and the troop moved on. Talbot had not passed the castle at a trot, and drew up in line opposite a stately house in Thomas Street, whose crowded round, admiring their gay accoutrements and martial order, for as yet there was no appearance of hostility in their minds, and the men themselves, in general, were ignorant of the purpose for which they were assembled. Presently the crowd round the gates began to break up and line the causeway in either side, and a gallant cavalcade was seen through the open arch, advancing from Thomas Court towards the Castle entrance.

"Make way for the Lord Deputy," cried two truncheon-bearers, dashing through the gate, and a shout rose on all sides that Lord Thomas was coming. Trumpeters and pursuivants in the rear rode first; then came the mace-bearer with his symbol of office, and after him the Earl himself, who is a rich scabbard of velvet, carried by its proper officer. Lord Thomas, himself, in all the rules of state, and dressed with a dazzling array of nobles and gentlemen, spurred after; the arched gateway was blocked for a moment with tossing plumes and banners, flashing arms and gleaming faces, as the magnificent troop burst it in like a flood of fire upon the dark and narrow precincts of the city.

But, behind the splendid cortège which headed their march, and like a cloud of gloom in the midst of the close pass long after the gay uniforms and flaring pennons of their leaders were indistinct in the distance.

Talbot, still high in passion, as the pomp drew near his position kept his eyes fixed on the face of the young Geraldine. Lord Thomas' brow was flushed, and he glanced fiercely from the castle to the river, as he listened to the urgent representations of an elderly knight by his side. But when his eyes fell on Talbot, where he sat reigning his horse in front of the troop, and with a facile, a haggard smile crossed his agitated features, and he rode on to the castle, and extended his hand to welcome him.

"Talbot!" he cried; "thy heaven, I thought that I knew thee wouldst not fail me in trouble; for he who is gone never tailed then in time of need. May my cause be forgotten and my name be a watchword of reproach, if I make not the day of his death the harbinger of a day of vengeance! His, Sir John, knowest thou that I mean to hold the island against Henry?"

"My Lord," replied Talbot, "I have not yet heard your lordship's design; but be assured that, while I have life in me, your father's son as long as I can hold my sword."

"My own design and my desire," said Lord Thomas, "is to fling a bold defiance in the teeth of the council, setting up my office and allegiance against theirs; and opening the war as becomes an associate of the royal house whose blood is in his veins. Is not so, Talbot?"

"My Lord, this is madness," cried the old knight at his side: "ride up to Berminghan tower with half your following before you, and the king's chief castle is in your hands without a blow; set a price on my instance before the council, and White will have his Drambridge raised and his ransom pounded before we can get out of the city; good our passage back from Mary's Abbey."

"Sir Oliver," replied the young lord, "thou art my uncle, and tiol forbid I should make light of thy counsel; but I shall never be sold of Thomas Fitzgerald that he struck his first blow against Henry the Eighth in fear. What say you, Sir John, at Rome or at Madrid?"

"My lord," cried a gentleman who rode near him, "what we do here is the question, not what they may say there. If we can, by force of arms, compel the council to grant the Earl his estates and his honors, and to restore to the blood its attainder, we shall have done more than the Pope and Emperor arrive, true one our allies will never ask whether we won the quarters where we lodge them by strength of hand or virtue of the king's writ."

"Sir Richard Walsh," exclaimed Lord Thomas, "that I know none here would cheapen my cause by a doubt; nevertheless, I would say that some among you were bent on turning this brave adventure to a rascal conspiracy!"

"You do me wrong, my lord," cried Sir Oliver Fitzgerald, coloring deeply; "I would I urge you no further; conduct the war as you will. Yet although I withdraw my unpalatable advice, I will not be the last to stand; for, before God, I would rather strike ten blows in your quarrel than waste an other word on your needless folly."

"Pardon me, my dear kinsman," cried the young noble, earnestly grasping the uncle's hand; "and you, Sir Richard, and those other knights and gentlemen, who have advised me otherwise; forgive me for what I here said; but, trust me, this is the soldier, this is the worthier course. Nor do I think I stand alone in preferring the honorable chance of open warfare, to the lazy success of surprise or treachery. Sir John Talbot, am I not right?"

"I am," cried Talbot, "would think our cause dishonored in the eyes of all brave men, if your lordship turned the sword, which you have sworn to use for the benefit of the King's government, against those who committed it, on the faith of that oath, into your lordship's hands."

"Push!" cried Burnel of Bellgriffin, "why talks of a breach of faith, and he already forsworn in his oath of allegiance!"

"There is no fault to be kept with heretics," said an ecclesiastic of the party; "Henry is a rotten sheep, to corrupt the flock of Christ—anathema sit!"

"He stuck up no point of honor when he put the Earl to death, after bringing him to London on a solemn pledge of safety!" exclaimed Sir Dominick Le Poer.

"The end, my children, justifies the means," again urged the churchman.

"Treachery for treachery!" cried Pares; "it is but equal justice."

"My lord!" exclaimed Talbot, drawing up, and that!" cried Le Poer, scornfully, "this is somewhat early for desertion; I say man here be afraid to join in our revolt, he is at liberty to withdraw himself at once: there is no need of spitting straws for an apology."

"Sir Dominick Le Poer," said Talbot, "if you mean me, I will tell you plainly, the chief fear I have in this affectature is being joined in it by one whom I once swore his back upon his friends, when blows were flying around him, and I will not turn my back upon his friends, when blows are flying around him, and I will not turn my back upon his friends, when blows are flying around him, and I will not turn my back upon his friends, when blows are

On Their Knees.

On the 20th of last month the Established Church of England and her hopeful daughter—the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, went on their knees and prayed unto the Lord for the prosperity and success of their Foreign Missions. We are always glad to see our neighbors at prayer, even when we cannot, as in the present instance, commend the manner in which it is performed, or feel the slightest sympathy for its object. For even a prayer that will never be granted is better than no prayer at all. But there are many who hold that it would have been more in keeping with the first rule of charity of this general supplication had been offered up for the Church at home. Her tribulations are great and numerous. She is rapidly losing both her followers and her creed. Sent on one side by the Catholic Church and on the other by rationalism and infidelity, it would have excited less wonder to see her strike wildly about for dear life, than spend her time in praying for the heathen.

We acknowledge that it is without a shade of regret that we witness the rapid breaking up of the Protestant Episcopal Church, both in this country and in England. Though she represents but a spurious form of Christianity, she held, it is true, at one time more Catholic truths than any other Protestant sect, and possessed a strong conservative element, which served for a considerable period as a breakwater against the torrent of infidelity. But the days of her usefulness are gone. The middle of the last century was her golden age. She had well nigh stamped Catholicity out of England, she had enthralled Ireland. The sources of her life—the acts of the British Parliament—were vigorous and well supplied. Those were the days when an English Bishop enjoyed his enormous revenues in peace. Those were the days when the lusty country parsons handed down to all the second ones delved among Greek roots. An occasional well-timed anti-popery sermon kept alive the faith and silenced the murmurs of the people.

But those days are gone forever. During the present century the career of the Anglican Church has been most disastrous. She has grown more Erastian than any other sect. In her attempts to resist "the encroachments of Rome" she sought the alliance of all the elements hostile to the Catholic Church. She seemed to forget that the sects were almost as bitterly opposed to her and to one another as to us, and that the introduction into any society of a few elements of contradictory character is equivalent to suicide. These destructive elements are now at work and are already showing fruit.

The Anglican Church is being rapidly swept away by two mighty currents, beside or of which she is able to control. One leads to Rome, the other to infidelity. Dean Stanley and Dr. Pusey are at the head of these contradictory movements. They are themselves nothing but the expression of two forces, both of which will sooner or later sweep away the last remnants of the Anglican Church. The former is an Anglican in name and a Deist in fact. The latter points out the way to Rome, though he is best likely to ever follow it himself. We have neither the space nor the inclination to draw a picture of the internal dissensions which arise from such a state of affairs. A few years more and the English Church will be relegated to the list of the source of her life will be cut off, and her death will be the immediate result. Her daughter on this side of the ocean is, if possible, even worse off than the mother at home. Her final dissolution is a mere question of time, and a very short time too. All that remains for us to do in regard to these two interesting churches, is to watch their spasms and final agony, and assist at their funeral.—Louisville Catholic Advocate.

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Pope has confirmed the appointment of Rev. Mr. McGarrigan as Bishop of Newark, N. J., and Rev. M. J. Gerosh as Bishop of Havana.

The name of the Most Rev. Dr. Delany, Lord Bishop of Cork, and the Most Rev. Dr. Nulty, Lord Bishop of Meath, has been placed on the Council of the Catholic Union of Ireland.

The Cathedral at Armagh, Ireland, is to be consecrated in June next. The first stone was laid March 17, 1840, just thirty-two years past St. Patrick's Day.

European mail advices say the law regarding religious corporations will scarcely come before the Italian Parliament before Lent. There is little doubt that the result of the debate will be to place Rome on the same footing with respect to religious institutions as the rest of Italy.

The Scotsman estimates the united Catholic population of England and Scotland at about 2,000,000, whose spiritual needs are attended to by nearly nineteen hundred priests. The Catholic population of Ireland is about twice that number, thirty-three, including a dozen, a majority of whom are forty-four thousand and twenty barons. Twenty-four of these are members of the House of Lords, the others are Catholic or Protestant baronets and thirty-six Catholics in the House of Commons.

DEATH OF CANON FOLEY.—The death is announced of Canon Forde, P. P., Blackrock and Roscarberry, county of Dublin, at the comparatively early age of fifty-two. Deceased, who held at various times important ecclesiastical positions, had been ailed for the past six months, and but a week ago was subjected to an operation not dissimilar to that which, performed in the late Emperor's case. Very recently a motion was made in one of the Dublin Councils for a monument to the memory of Ann, Mr. O'Keeffe, P. P., Callan, vs. Cardinal Cullen, deceased, which illness of the deceased Canon, whose evidence at the time was considered material.—Cork Herald, Jan. 14.

Why Engage What is Costly.

"What can't be cured must be endured," says the proverb; but imaginary cures are to cease, and therefore it is the duty of every sufferer to examine. Dyspepsia bars mentality a right to continue dyspepsia to the end of their days if they choose, but as it is not supposed that any rational being prefers physical torment to ease and health, the probability is that if all sufferers from indigestion were convinced that an absolute, infallible remedy for their complaint existed, they would at once accept it. We know that Dr. Tutt's Sarsaparilla claims that such a remedy does exist, and that he offers it for any disorder or derangement of the stomach that can not organic, malignant and incurable. The testimonials that go to establish this important fact can be consulted at Dr. Tutt's Dispensary, 844 Broadway, New York, and have been engraved by a total disregard of all dietary rules, and diminished and aggravated attack by medicinal treatment or dietetic derangement, have in hundreds of instances in our rural towns within three months by the irresistible test of this unprejudiced examiner and stereotyper. It should be remembered that while some of the diseases arising from a vicious state of the blood are of long standing, others are of recent origin, and that a cure for the former will not always relieve the latter. Dr. Tutt's Sarsaparilla is a cure for all blood diseases, and the Vegetable Liver Pills are a specific for all disorders of the liver, stomach and bowels. Both are sold by druggists everywhere.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

BUTTE COUNTY.

A. M. Simpson picked up a piece of gold in Wyman's Ravine, the other day, weighing thirty ounces and worth about $450. It was said this piece was found on the Garden Ranch, and among the tailings thrown out by the Chinamen, which we have heretofore mentioned as paying $2,500 for a claim of two acres. It is evident the Chinamen knew the deposit when they bought the claim. Wyman's Ravine is an old '49 placer, and seems to retain some of its original vim yet.

CALAVERAS.

A lead of coal has recently been discovered in the vicinity of Lancha Plana. The vein is reported to be about four feet in thickness and the coal of superior quality.

The new proprietors of the Good Hope mine, at Mosquito Gulch, have commenced work in good earnest.

The Gwin mine is steadily keeping up its enormous product of bullion. The yield last week—and a days run of thirty six stamps —was $7,000, an average of $1,300 per day. The rock crushed is taken from the 600-foot level, and there is ore enough in sight, without sinking the shaft deeper, to keep the batteries employed a year.

In the Victorian mine, near Railroad, the main shaft was reached a depth of three hundred and ten feet, and a ledge about four feet in thickness. The quartz is high grade, averaging, by working process, $25 per ton. Gold and rich sulphurets that assay as high as $225 per ton.

EL DORADO.

The Placerville Argonaut of Febuary 8th gives the following: Last Tuesday there was a fine development of rich quartz in the old Reid and Miller claim on Weber Creek, about two and a half miles south of this city. The ledge is about three feet wide, showing free gold plentifully. The present prospects throughout, with a very rich streak, justify us in saying that the richest and the foot-wall, while in the gouge of pulverized slate and decomposed or shattered quartz between the ledge and the wall on average of $1 to a pan is obtained. We understand that the claim which is under the superintendency of Charles Gildea, is principally owned by San Francisceans. The richness of the rock and the general appearance of the claim have greatly encouraged other quartz miners in this vicinity.

PLACER.

The large working incline shaft in the St. John mine—on the same angle as the vein —is now down to the 540 ft. strata, and they are now running levels in better and a larger ledge than at any time since breaking ground on the surface. In the level, at or near the bottom, they have very lately struck what is supposed to be the top of a very large deposit of ore, of from six to ten feet in width, and bids fair to be as large as the chimney was above, 620 feet in length.

A few works since a valuable mine was discovered by T. W. Emerson and Clint Boggs, of White River. On prospecting the rock, they found it very much decomposed, contain about $35 in gold, besides several dollars in silver mixed with a trace of copper.

NEVADA.

The large amount of snow on the mountains give confidence to quartz mine owners that the water supply will be ample to profitably work their claims next season.

A correspondent, writing to the Placer Argus, says: At one time this winter there was more snow in the mountains in this district; at the present time there are but six. The Indians Hill claims, owned by William Judd and H. H. Brown, use 500 inches of water with a pressure of about 200 feet. The ground they are washing is hard, but cannot withstand the furious stream that they pour upon it. They have been washing long, and after getting their claims in proper shape will use powder sparingly, as they can get more gravel by

On Their Knees.

On the 20th of last month the Established Church of England and her hopeful daughter—the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, went on their knees and prayed, unto the Lord for the prosperity and success of their Foreign Missions. We are always glad to see our neighbors at prayer, even when we cannot, as in the present instance, commend the manner in which it is performed, or feel the slightest sympathy for its object. Forms are a prayer that will never be granted is better than no prayer at all. But there are many who hold that it would have been more in keeping with the first rule of charity of this general supplication had been offered up for the Church at home. Her tribulations are great and numerous. She is rapidly losing both her followers and her creed. Dent on one side by the Catholic Church and on the other by rationalism and infidelity, it would have excited less wonder to see her strike wildly about for dear life, than spend her time in praying for the heathen.

We acknowledge that it is without a shade of regret that we witness the rapid breaking up of the Protestant Episcopal Church, both in this country and in England. Though she represents but a spurious form of Christianity, she held, it is true, at one time more Catholic truths than any other Protestant sect, and possessed a strong conservative element, which served for a considerable period as a break water against the torrent of infidelity. But the days of her usefulness are gone. The middle of the last century was her golden age. She then had eleven archbishops and twenty barons. Twenty-four of these are members of the House of Lords. She now has but eight-and-thirty bishops and thirty-six Catholics in the House of Commons.

DEATH OF CANON FORDE.—The death is announced of Canon Forde, P. P., Blackrock and Rostrevor, county of Dublin, at the comparatively early age of fifty-two. Deceased, who held at various times important ecclesiastical positions, had been in failing for the past six months, and but a week ago was subjected to an operation on the throat, which could not be performed in the latter's case. Very recently a motion was made in one of the Dublin Courts for the appointment of the case of Rev. Mr. O'Keefe, P. P., Cullen, vs. Cardinal Cullen, because of the illness of the deceased Canon, whose evidence at the time was considered material.—Cork Herald, Jan. 14.

Why Endure What is Curable?

"What can't be cured must be endured," says the proverb; but many diseases are cured, and therefore it is the merest simpleton to endure it. Dyspepsia have certainly a right to consume every organ of the body and of life if they choose, but as it is not supposed that any rational being prefers physical torment to ease and comfort, the sympathies of all will be with the sufferers who have not availed themselves of the admirable, infallible remedy for their complaint—Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Try it for a thorough and permanent cure. The record of its success is unparalleled for the past twenty years, and it is fearlessly alleged that during the whole of that time it has never failed to afford permanent relief in any disorder or derangement of the stomach, liver, kidneys or nervous system, and the testimonials that go to establish this important fact, can be consulted by the most skeptical. Enough cases have been reported to fill a respectable sized octavo volume, and the whole number of authenticated cures effected by medicinal means would be recorded cures by medicinal means would be found to exceed a million, were it possible to collect within three months the whole aggregate of the remarkable and effective. It should be remembered that wherever the Bitters appear in America many other diseases, Biliousness, Rheumatism, Debility, Remitte, prevailed at the time, and cases of blood in the head, nausea, vertigo and sleeplessness are among the concommitants and results, and for all alone the great vegetable tonic is a specific. It never loses upon the stomach, and through the same upon the necessary and nervous systems and the bowels. Its general effect being always genial and beneficent.

A load of coal has recently been discovered in the vicinity of Jacobs Flats. The vein is reported to be about four feet in thickness and the coal of superior quality.

The new proprietors of the Good Hope mine, at Mauquito Gulch, have commenced work in good earnest.

The Gwin mine is steadily keeping up its enormous product of bullion. The yield last week—six days run of thirty six stamps —was $7,800, an average of $1,300 per day. The rock crushed is taken from the 600-foot level, and there is ore enough in sight, without sinking the shaft deeper, to keep the batteries employed a year.

In the Wolverine mine, near Railroad, the main shaft was reached a depth of three hundred and ten feet, showing a ledge about four feet in thickness. The quartz is high g'ade, averaging, by working process, $25 per ton. The ore is rich in sulphurets that assay as high as $245 per ton.

EL DORADO.

The Placerville Democrat of February 8th gives the following: Last Tuesday there was a fine development of rich quartz in the old Reid and Miller claim on Weaver Creek, about two and a half miles south of this city. The ledge is about four feet in the clear, showing free gold and yielding handsome prospects throughout, with a very rich streak of quartz in the middle. In sinking, next the foot-wall, while in the gouge of pulverized slate and decomposed rock, shattered quartz between the ledge and foot-wall an average of $1 to a pan is obtained. We understand that the claim, which is under the superintendency of Charles Gildea, is principally owned by San Francisco parties, and those of the latter who visited the ground on account of the claim have greatly encouraged other quartz miners in this vicinity.

KERN.

The large working incline shaft in the St. John mine—on the same angle as the vein —is now down 50 feet, at which depth they are now running levels in better and a larger ledge than at any time since breaking ground for the entrance. In the level, at or near the bottom, they have very lately struck what is supposed to be the log of a very large deposit of ore, of from six to ten feet in width, and bids fair to be as large as the celebrated Monte, 620 feet in length.

A few weeks since a valuable mine was discovered by L. W. Emerson and Clint Boggs, of White River. On prospecting the rock it was found by careful estimate to contain about $35 in gold, besides several dollars in silver mixed with a trace of copper.

NEVADA.

The large amount of snow on the mountains gives promise that hydraulic miners that the water supply will be ample to profitably work their claims next season.

PLACER.

A correspondent, writing to the Placer Argus, says: At one time this whiter there were ten ore mills in operation in this district; at the present time there are but six. The Indiana Mill, recently owned by William Judd and H. B. Brown, use 500 inches of water with a pressure of about 100 feet. The ground they are washing is hard, but cannot withstand the furious stream they pour upon it. They have not been washing long, after getting their claims in proper shape will use powder where water will not readily work it. The Mineral Dash runs about 1,000 inches of water, the South Yuba Canal Company supplying all that is used. There is also quite a demand in the price of water from last year's rates. Last year's rates were fifteen cents per inch for 24 hours, ten cents for 12 hours by day, and five cents for 12 hours by night. This reduction was inaugurated by the South Yuba Canal Company. There have been but few "clean-ups," but those made have been very satisfactory. The Long Cañon mine is one of the largest now ever made in this district. The Gold Run Ditch and Mining Company are also at work on their new outlet tunnel.

The Placer Argus was shown by J. H. Nott some days since, taken from the Rising Sun quartz mine at Colfax, which was literally interspersed with gold. This mine has been worked profitably for about six years; the main shaft is down 400 feet, and they have drifted about 100 feet on the ledge. All of the rock taken from the ledge has been worked and yielded on an average $5 per ton. The specimen shown us was taken out between the 300 and 400-foot levels, and some of them were taken at the 300 feet apart. The company have a five-stamp mill in operation. They cleaned up for the month of January over $1,000.

NEVADA.

The Gold Hill News of the 7th says: General Williams of Virginia, and Mr. Schultz of the Bullion mine, are trying a new method of prospecting for ore. On some level in the mine, about half a mile east of the Ophir works, they have set up some machinery similar to that used in sinking artesian wells, and have commenced boring for ore. The boring is done with a diamond drill, and the hole is about a diameter. A mile latare start has already been sunk to the depth of 690 feet. If the experiment in searching for ore proves a success, it will have a tendency to revolutionize present methods of prospecting.

The Eureka Sentinel says one of the richest strikes ever made in the Eureka District has just been reported in the Orange mine, which is located on Prospect Mountain, less than a quarter of a mile from Eureka, and in sight of the latter mine. At the depth of 350 feet a ledge of beautiful white quartz, six inches to a foot in thickness and wide, was been reached, presenting a mottled appearance, produced by argentiferous galena ore, thickly interspersed among the rock, with a small quantity of streaks of lead running either way. This is a fine milling rock and assays $141 24 in silver. The effect of this discovery on the prospecting of all the mines on the same hill will be most beneficial, as it affords a new incentive to miners to work in the neighborhood to develop their mines to a greater depth, in the hope of realizing the same results.

IRISH INTELLIGENCE.

Death of Monsigner Forde. — By the death of the Very Rev. Monsigner Forde, P. P. of Booterstown, in whom the diocese has lost one of its ablest, best and wealthiest men, the interests of the Catholic Church, those laws and ordinances were themselves no answer to a similar question in one of the Queen's Courts of Justice—that, in fact, a contract is illegal which prevents priests from going to law with one another. The struggling of the case did not conclude on Tuesday, and was to have been resumed on yesterday, but Chief Justice Whiteside seemed already to lean in favor of the plaintiff, while Judge Barry asked one or two questions intended to reduce that revered gentleman's counsel's arguments ad absurdum.—Nation, Jan. 18.

Compensation for Land.

At the Fermoy Land Sessions yesterday a claim for £130 was made by Mr. Alexander Hosken against Captain D. J. Mansergh for improvements effected on a farm at Mocroney from which the claimant has been evicted. The farm was held by the Rev. Mr. Langley, rector of Kilworth, for a term of seven years from 1865, and was assigned by him in 1870 to the present tenant. The Chairman was of opinion that although the land was properly treated by the claimant, it had been deteriorated by the course of husbandry pursued by the Rev. Mr. Langley, and the case was dismissed. At the London Land Sessions yesterday Mr. Thomas Fuller claimed £497 for improvements alleged to have been effected in a large farm at Clashnacree, which he held from Colonel Biggs as assignee for a term of twenty-one years. The landlord preferred a counter claim to the amount of £600 for waste and deterioration. After a lengthened investigation the case was dismissed with costs.—Cork Examiner, Jan. 18.

The Retreat Murder.

The Holy rood inquest has been dragging its slow length along during the week; very many witnesses have been examined, but scarcely anything new has been disclosed concerning the murder or the suspected murderers. Charlotte Reed and also Mary Ann have been identified as the women who traveled to Belfast in the cart, and were seen with bundles near the residence of Miss Kerr on the morning the crime was discovered; but beyond this little evidence so far does not establish much. A somewhat curious controversy has arisen between the Coroner and the Crown solicitor. The Coroner desired to examine several of those who are in custody charged with harboring the Reeds, but the latter has maintained that they have no power to bring forward these persons as witnesses, and the matter remains, as we write, undecided.—Ireland, January 18.

Tenant "Banquets."

When the tenantry of an estate give a "banquet" to their landlord or a testimonial to their agent, the world is not much astray as to the meaning of the proceeding, and there is little to disturb the established notion in the dinner supposed to have been given by the Herbert tenants at the Railway Hotel last week, in Killarney. Mr. Herbert was there, of course, and there, too, came The O'Donoghue, both gentlemen intent on proving that never had the peasantry better friends, or Irish sensibilities been more faithful pupils. Of course, no one contradicted them there. But of course, no one contradicted them before the glasses had well ceased to jingle, or a member of a fishers' club" had declined the claims of the honored gentlemen, and exhibited them before the public in their true light as the subservient and slavish followers of the enemies of the people.—Nation, January 18.

The Case of Daniel Reddin.

The case of Daniel Reddin and the political prisoners in the cause of a fresh agitation among the Irish in London. On Saturday evening there was a meeting of the London Amnesty Association, at which Mr. John Ferguson of Glasgow presided, and at which it was announced that meetings will be held immediately in all the metropolitan boroughs in support of political prisoners and for the denunciation of the cruelty and for the denunciation of the abominable cruelties of which Daniel Reddin is alleged to have been the victim.—Nation, January 18.

Evictions.

"We had seventy-three cases of ejectment at the last Quarter Sessions between Killarney, Tralee and Listowel, mostly all on notice to quit"—where the lessons it wears perfectly solvent," so writes a trusty and perfectly solvent," so writes a trusty and intelligent correspondent in the Kingdom of Kerry. And yet we have the Land Act. Kerry of Irishmen legislating, for Kerry, and at least will learn, through bitter experience, how to value it.—Nation, January 18.

Plus the Ninth.

There are many Sovereigns in Europe whose career has been marked by violent acts, but there is none whose whole reign has been surrounded by such circumstances so unblushingly and attended by mi-fortunes so undeserved as that of Pius the Ninth. He had scarcely ascended to the Chair of Peter when a storm burst over the Conclave which gathered Crowns, and broke almost the whole world, and raised the people in mad tumult; some sung by tyranny into revolt, others hurried into insurrection by the mere contagion of the prevailing spirit. In the midst of the mad whirl that throne of the gentlest and most tender-hearted ruler in the world was upheaved. Plus the Ninth was hunted from his capital, from amidst the Romans his own loyal subjects, whose consecration relations of whose he had become a honored part, into a long and painful exile. Out of the ocean grew order, a French Republic overthrew the Roman Republic and restored to Pius the IX and to his people the Vatican. But the evil spirit then awakened was only temporarily allayed. The revolutionary maniac, piracy allayed. The revolutionary maniac, fire, was directed by cunning hands, and its destructive qualities turned to the profit of those who had fanned it to one heat. An Emperor was frightened by an attempt at assassination into paying the game of Emmanuel and Cavour, and so Piedmont was sulled into Italy. The King and his Ministers became conspirators, and lent the weapons with which the crimes were to be committed. And after a time the bonds were cut, the mask fell off Sicily, now on the arch conspirator found for himself that which he had set the best upon. And so the "sons of liberty" Carbonarism which had gathered for the destruction of Pius the Ninth's throne began to keep off the revolutionists—the avowed pirates. But the unavowed pirates were behind. An Italian Government was established on the sanity of sixty thousand men and with all the course irresistible. Victor Emmanuel, the constitutional King, was grown strong, and Napoleon had either grown timid or unwilling, and he insisted on the opinion. A sham treaty was executed upon, by which the Lieni King of Italy declared himself not to be any more the Pope. True and Papal army did gallant service against them, and for a while the Papal States were fenced with apparent sincerity. But then came the fatal Franco-Prussian war, which took only overthrow Napoleon but for a time utterly paralyzed the power of the grands of Europe. As soon as it was gone that Prussia was down and helpless. Victor Emmanuel saw his game clear. Revolutionists were called from Naples, by-and-by to threaten the Pope, and then the troops of the King were sent in to protect the Pope. The protection was of course such as the wolf offers to the sheep. The last remnant of the patrimony of the Church was torn from it, and the Pope was made a virtual prisoner within the precincts of the Vatican. What a series of griefs, what a long succession of agonies to be endured by one man, feeble, advanced in age, and whose heart bleeds for the burden of watching over the spiritual wants of 200,000,000!

But if the career of the Pope has been sadly darkened by temporal vicissitude and by more than ordinary suffering, it has not been without its bright gleam of consolation. From the time of the martyrs in the Catacombs to the days of the martyrs in the Vatican, religion seems to have always shone brightest under persecution. Tried as in a refiner's fire, the pure gold shows to self. Amidst plunder, amidst deliberately demented sacrilege, amidst systematized infidelity, never has religion appeared more triumphantly than during the reign of Pius the Ninth. Crippled as he is his state by the consequences of enemies, never was his influence wider. Homage is paid from all ends of the earth to the throne of the meek prisoner of the Vatican. In this, of course, nuts. be detected the guiding hand of Providence, and the vindication of His promise to the Church. But we see also a proof of the personal nobleness of Pius the Ninth, who has so impressed itself on the world, and has brought to the foot of the Throne the Republican of the far West, the heir of all the Russias, a royal prince the son of Victoria, the Ambassador of the Turk, and even the dignitaries of the Oriental sects which are schismatic to the Holy See.

We, the people of Ireland, that are we to do now, when all the world is bearing homage to the grand old man who sits beside the Tiber, as emblem of His promise of faith over the afflictions of this world? Shall we Irish men and women hold back from offering our humble testimony of loyalty and fealty to the earthly head of that Church to which we have clung with such tenacity? We need not ask the question. Our churches are to-morrow to be made the recipient of the annual tribute of the faithful, and we know that it will be given with the freedom of children to a beloved father, of chivalrous subjects to a monarch, in whom they glory.—Cork Examiner, January 23.

NAPOLEON III.

JANUARY 9, 1873.

I.

Roll, drum and trump, through Europe roll,
A knell the Eagles' sinews lay!
A lied heart and a gallant soul—
Feel all sustainers of revenge—
Rate faint their grave, and stand
Pull to the judgment of the Lord:
No more shall warring court and camp
Awaken thy peace, Napoleon!

II.

For thou hast reaped the bars of Doom,
And carried him the reaper day!
Through what alternation of gloom,
Thou history and the Ages say,
By wayward wings men call Award!
Thy scarred wings men call Award!
Thy scarred wings men call Award!
Thy scarred wings men call Award!
For thee what cosmos the narrow past!

III.

Thee hadst thy triumphs—where are they?
Thy struggles—and long their storm stood
The pathetic pole—the vanquished lot!
Where with which shrieks thy bones
Yet on the field will stand, he failed!
Thy land will guard it through all time
In glory or in grief enshrined.

IV.

Thou, cradled in imp-princes home,
Wast he, the Heartbreak of Wife,
Traded for spurs through Austria's throne,
And Rome against the lion the world,
Rolled scarlet mantles round the world,
And dared the Emperor's star was her—
Then every nerve—up! up! was her—
The serpent—at the eagle.

V.

Riot people swathed thy infant limbs,
And rainbow hues proclaimed thy birth:
Thy purple hung evening's dim
Thy saints was loud at shrine at earth:
Prayer trembled in our cradle—
Of dazzling, 'mid clashing faith!
And this is all, a sister's arm
Receives thee, and a foreign tomb
Heaped ashes, and a foreign tomb

VI.

Ah, well for thee if, when the cloud
Envelopes thee—hopeless—
Thy soul to thee a riddled shroud
Earth and its sorrows swallow it sun—
A shade—vision and starshine crossed
A mighty soul and a mighty grave,
And the rest but that tangle like bust
Wound on thy grave and thy name.

VII.

Not so decreed! The Empire, raised
Over cinders and ashes—father slings—
The Empire—the Empire—the Empire!
The Empire was the word—the Empire
Was the word for their triumphant slings—
Was the word for their triumphant slings—
Were Napoleon's name and word!
Beneath the Tetrarch's savage heel.

VIII.

Him out, O Lord, from script and mist
The Redeemer at ordeal!
And rest, O Lord, for him forgiven!
Of him the beloved, despatched,
Who knelt for Sacrament—the broken rest,
Whose last words were Mother!
Whose last words were Mother!
And strove to grasp her close with Pain.

IX.

Ah! is not his? Is not his sleep then calm
Who recompensed?—beyond its sea
Is earth's—the earth's—the earth's—calm
Of the last stated from Prison till Rome
Across the Atlantic's—deep—
Our wave—how'er the faction gale
Thy star shall rise at last.

X.

"All is not lost!" says sleep then calm
Lidia's Lidia's latter ever—sorry.
In garlands—the Empress—Imperial pain

How Election Returns were factored in Louisiana—Frightful Recitations of Corruption, Fraud and Perfidy.

The Supervisor in Duplessme parish, Louisiana, received fifty-two and fifty duplicate registration papers of the same number, and Supervisor in Plaquemine parish, Louisiana, received one hundred and fifty duplicate registration papers of the same number. Witness learned of the fact, and fifty-four of these papers were destroyed. Witness learned of the fact, and fifty-four of these papers were destroyed. ## IRISH INTELLIGENCE.

Death of Monsignor Forde.

With deep sorrow we record the death of the Very Rev. Monsignor Forde, P. P. of Roscarbery, in whom the diocese has lost one of its ablest, best and worthiest men. In the ecclesiastical affairs of Dublin, for nearly a quarter of a century, Canon Forde had borne a more or less active part; being filled, almost from the outset, with the confidence in the administration of the diocese; and, having to the last hour, enjoyed, as he well and truly deserved to enjoy, the esteem and regard of its venerated head. Indeed, we think we may say that by not alone the Cardinal Archbishop of Dublin, but by the Holy See itself, were his abilities duly recognized and justly appreciated. And truly never did purer devotedness, more thorough and whole-souled fidelity, serve the Catholic Church and the Pastor of Peter. There have been episodes in the life of Canon Forde—episodes all unknown save to the outer world—of letters, of parts, of, to the outer world—of letters, of parts, of sacrifices, for the cause of religion—let us say the way in behalf of Catholic Ireland, rather say in behalf of Catholic Ireland and of the Holy See—that would, if only all forth the warmest emotions of the Irish heart. Death has come as a happy release from long anguish and suffering. From a painful illness, it was only a few days ago we were all cheered by the announcement that the convalescence of Monsignor was secured. His death has been a shock to the city. Very few words were by all, it was only those who had the opportunity of knowing his sterling honesty and kindliness of heart, his simple piety, who will most keenly and genial nature, who will most keenly feel his loss. Canon Forde was the senior clergyman of the city and diocese, and one of the oldest priests. He has been spared, would almost certainly have attained to a high position in the Irish Hierarchy. With heartfelt sorrow we find ourselves chronicling his early decease; and fervently we pray God to accept and reward to his soul.—Nation, January 18.

Illness of Dr. Dorrian.

We are grieved to hear that the truly loved and revered Bishop of Down and Connor, Most Rev. Dr. Dorrian, has been seriously ill of erysipelas. The malady is now, we are glad to say, said to be somewhat abated, and we trust that the skill of his medical attendants will enable them to overcome it. Of course, no one is more faithful reporter than we, but, before the glasses had well ceased to jingle, before the cheers of a fashions' dish' had died away, a member of a fashions' club' had maintained the claims of the honored gentleman, and established them before the public in the most clear light as the interpreter and the sketch followers of the sentiments of the people.—Nation, January 18.

The Case of Daniel Reddin.

The case of Daniel Reddin and the political prisoners in the cases of a fresh agitation among the Irish in London. On Saturday evening there was a meeting of the London Amnesty Association, at which Mr. John Ferguson of Glasgow presided, and at which it was announced that meetings will be held immediately in all the metropolitan boroughs in support of political amnesty, and for the denunciation of the abominable cruelties of which Daniel Reddin is alleged to have been the victim.—Nation, January 18.

Evictions.

"We had seventy-three cases of ejectment at the last Quarter Sessions between Killarney, Tralee and Listowel, mostly all on large, Tralee and Listowel, mostly all on estates so quit"—where the tenants "were perfectly solvent." So writes a trusty and faithful correspondent in the Kingdom of Kerry. And yet we have that cruelest fruit of British legislation, the Land Act, before us, and it has, through bitter experience, but too value it.—Nation, January 18.

Pius the Ninth.

There are many Sovereigns in Europe whose career has been marked by violent deeds, but there is none whose whole reign has been surrounded by circumstances so extraordinary, and attended by an influence so undeserved as those of Pius the Ninth. He had scarcely ascended to the Chair of Peter when a storm burst over the Continent that scattered Crowns, and broke sceptres, and roused the people in mad tumult; some suffering tyranny into revolt, others hurried into insurrection by the mere contagion of the prevailing spirit. In the midst of the mad whirl that throne of the proudest and most tender-hearted ruler in the world was not spared. Pius the Ninth was hunted from his capital. From the streets the Romans who loved him, from the venerable sanctuaries of the Vatican, amidst plunder, amidst shouts of the infuriated soldiery, and even assassination whose more than the Pope. Crippled as he is, he is still a prisoner of the Vatican. In this, of course, there is nothing personal. Homage is paid from all flagons alike, without the slightest distinction of the needy and the wealthy. It is the office, not the occupant, that is the object of the Catholic. But we must not be deceived. The Empire, raised on the ruins of the Republic, has been overthrown, and the Republic has been restored. The Kingdom of Italy has been established in Rome, and the Pope is a prisoner. Such are the facts. Let us see how they have been brought about.—Nation, January 18.

Free Government a Farce.

How Election Returns were Doctored in Louisiana—Frightful Revelations of Corruption—Letter from Governor Kellogg.

At the sitting of the Senate Committee on the Louisiana case, February 7, Mr. Morton said that the returns from the Louisiana election were doctored.

Captain Jacques testified that he was United States Deputy Marshal and United States Supervisor at Plaquemine parish. He received six hundred and fifty ballots to secure registration papers for New Orleans after election was signed by 1,314 whites and took the names of all but three hundred and fifty. The Committee showed him the poll list. The witness identified the signatures to the affidavits. He said he did not know how many of the names of colored persons he signed for registration papers. Witness found one of the Germans was not permitted to vote because a mistake was made in the ward in his registration papers. Took his affidavit. He made a general statement of intimidation and fraud. Didn't swear to the report. Signed it. Nothing but the facts in the report true. Nothing but the facts he had for the party induced him to make the report. Supervisor promised to get witness a position in the custom-house, but didn't fulfill his promise.

The British Marriage Law.

Judge Lodlow, of Philadelphia, recently passed upon a case wherein a respectable Irishman set up as a defence against prosecution for neglect and obligation to support his first wife, a statute of the reign of George II., 3rd, which declared that marriages not duly enforced (indeed, statute does not use the word marriage) in the last case tried under it was that of the notorious Major Yerger, which made his marriage with a Protestant and Catholic in passing on the case Judge Ludlow said: "In the eyes of the law the woman who alleges that she married defendant lived with him as her husband, and bore children by him of seven children, all of whom are now dead except two, and one of the seven died in infancy, with his mother in the court. The defendant does not deny that he went through the ceremony of marriage with the plaintiff, and that the ceremony was performed by a Catholic priest in a private house in the place of the residence of the parties. The cohabitation and birth of children, and the publication of the marriage, are admitted, but the defendant claims that as he was married by a priest as a fact to this motion an English statute passed in the nineteenth year of the reign of George II., which declares (chap er 13, section 1) that every marriage that shall be celebrated after the 25th day of March, 1746, by a priest or Popish person who shall be one or who hath professed himself to be a Protestant, shall be void, and the parties to such marriage, and the person who shall solemnize the same, shall be adjudged to be guilty of felony, and shall suffer death as in cases of felony without benefit of clergy. The statute was then enacted.

Mr. Sumner entered the United States Senate in 1851; Mr. Wilson in February, 1855, to fill out a vacancy, and Mr. Trumbull on the 4th of March that year, about a month later than Mr. Wilson. These are the longest continuous services. Mr. Cameron, of the present Senators, first entered the body in 1856.

M. l'Abbe J. Jallabert's "History of Catholicism before Christ" is said to be a very extraordinary work. It is the history of all the religions of the earth before the coming of our Lord, and gives evidence of the truth of Christianity. The true revealed religion was found to undergo sixty days imprisonment, for an article in defence of the Pope's position. And yet nothing is said to the editor of the Liberal, or to the other caricaturers of the Holy Father.—Italian justice indeed!

The inhabitants of Great Britain drink over £106,163,000 worth of liquor in a year, over £35,000,000 worth of bread less than they imbibe. Eleven times as much is spent in drink as in the education of the thousand millions of Faisaff's dealings at the present time would be found in the vast grocery of the period.

In 1805 a couple were divorced in Gratiot county, who had been married seventeen years; for the sole reason that they no longer desired to live together. A year later the separation the divorced husband married again, and another man married the divorced wife. They all live now in entire harmony, and recently held a sort of family reunion.

The foreign trade of England is enormous. Last year the aggregate amounted to $9,016,699,000. The imports were $5,766,000,000. The exports $3,250,000,000. In 1870 the aggregate value of the trade was an increase over the trade of 1871, the aggregate of which being nearly one thousand millions of millions of dollars.

It was a pretty and significant conceit of the Parisian jeweler, who, having been sent a gray hair of a President, had a brooch set in diamonds made some one of it, made a brooch of the Prussian eagle holding in his claws the single hair, surrounded by the two words of the motto of Strasbourg, "Nunquam Retrorsum," which were written, "Alsace and Lorraine —you only have a hair."

Owing to the mismanagement of the Washington estate by the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association, the privilege of farming the home and tomb of the Father of our Country will be sold at monopoly by the highest bidder. The Catholic episcopacy has lost, during the past year, two Roman and one Spanish cardinal, one Latin patriarch, six archbishops, of whom two were Italians, one Portuguese, one American, one Peruvian and one Greek; twenty-six bishops, of whom seven were Italians, five Englishmen, four Frenchmen, three Americans, one Austrian and one Mexican.

LECTURE ON THE LITERATURE OF IRELAND.

By Father Devlin, of Philadelphia.

A large number assembled in Concert Hall, Philadelphia, on Wednesday evening, February 5th, to hear Father Devlin's lecture on "The Literature of Ireland." He spoke as follows:

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: The subject of my lecture is "The Literary Place of History." Every civilized country has been a production for those arts and sciences which adorn and beautify, as well as nature the various obstacles of human genius and instinct. From the very commencement of history we find nations, as they grew in prosperity and in power, to keep pace with learning hand in hand with their material progress; so that if the world had of power might ever sway supreme over unwilling hands, the strokes of which would be employed in the ordinary avocations and the ordinary work of a zealous priest; they were men who, with all their troubles, with all their labors, with all their disadvantages, wrote and studied to the long hours of the night, and their works remain to-day a monument of their genius, of their learning and of their immortality.

THE BARDS AND SENACHIES.

After the tenth century troubles came over the land. Hordes after hordes of barbarians came down from the North, and the glorious age of Irish civilization was growing our Irish soil. Not only were the monasteries and all their sacred edifices destroyed, but the schools and seats of learning were also razed to the ground; not only were the priests driven into the mountains and forced to flee to the caves of Gibraltar; we add more, I repeat, than was believed by the Spanish Cortes in 1869, that we are not a mere fragment of the past, either on the one hand or the other, but on the other hand, we will not have an inch of ground, we will not have an inch more than we have, not even as much as the Church of Rome has in the Kingdom of Italy, as the Minister of Foreign Affairs for the new Kingdom of Italy."

Regulations for Lent in 1873.
For the Diocese of San Francisco.

1. All the WEEK DAYS of Lent, from Ash Wednesday till Easter Sunday, are fast days of precept, on one meal, with the allowance of a moderate collation.

2. The precept of fasting implies also that of abstinence from the use of flesh meats. But, by dispensation, the use of flesh meats is allowed in this Diocese during Lent, except the following days to wit: the Wednesdays and Fridays, the Ember-days, and the Thursday and Saturday of the first week in which days there is no leave to eat of flesh meat even at the table of those who have Dispensative Papers, which have been hereby ascribed to grant to many of necessity to be judged by them. All Saturdays are also days of abstinence, but not of obligation.

3. The Frumentaceous use of Eggs and fresh meats at the same meal is prohibited in Lent, even on Sundays.

4. Some prayers, at option, are recommended for during Lent, particularly on those days in which flesh meat is used.

5. Lent being a penitential time, the Pastors are requested to lay before the Faithful the importance of frequent confession, and also the generous substitution of something in their behalf, which they may be faithful from the first Sunday of Lent; they will frequently and earnestly impress upon their respective flocks the necessity of attending, before all other Christian duties, to the affairs of their souls, and they will exhort them to the faithful discharge of their Christian duties, the only thing that can secure to them the everlasting happiness of heaven. Parish priests may, with their approbation, appoint in what other portions of the Diocese Lent is to be observed.

THE "CARNIVAL OF BLOOD."

These words have become almost a stereotyped heading for our newspapers. Their appearance is followed in every instance by a leading article complaining of the crimes of murder and violence which so frequently sully the reputation of our community. But, it is much to be regretted that all these eloquent headings are never of any avail, and that the knife and pistol still continue to be the favorite agencies for redressing real or fancied wrongs. The State of California, though large in area, has a population of little more than half a million, and yet we venture to assert that there are more murders and manslaughter committed within its boundaries in the course of one year than there are committed in Ireland, with just ten times as many people, during the same length of time. The conclusion which most persons would draw from this statement is that Californians are a great deal more reckless and criminally inclined than the Irish people in their native land. We should not like to put the logical inference so strongly as that, although we believe we would be fairly justified in doing so.

The circumstances under which this State was founded may fairly be pleaded as extenuating in some degree the prevalence of crimes of violence against the person. It is a fact exemplified a thousand times in the course of history that the countries which offered the prospects of a sudden acquisition of wealth were first sought by the more adventurous and less steady classes. However, this plea should not be urged too far. It applied forcibly in the rough-and-ready times when all of California that was trodden by the feet of American citizens was little better than a mining-camp—when the administration of law was not properly organized and justice was dealt out in a summary and by impromptu tribunals; but it certainly cannot be considered to have much application now, when our community represents with tolerable accuracy the formation of the American people as a whole, and society is established on its usual foundations. Therefore, however humiliating it may be to us, we cannot help confessing that a stain of blood, dark enough and wide enough to affect the entire population, rests upon the State. If we inquire closely into the origin of this misfortune, we will find that it arises principally from two things—firstly, the pernicious and inexcusable practice of carrying deadly weapons; and secondly, the want of an adequate idea of the sacredness of human life. The former of these causes we have frequently denounced; and, indeed, it has earned the condemnation of every right-thinking man.

There was a law on our statute book prohibiting the carrying of weapons of offense, but it was repealed by the last Legislature on the grounds that it was respected only by peaceful citizens, and that then the evil-disposed gained an advantage. It seems to us that this reason was very much like a discreditable acknowledgment of weakness, and that if any serious attempts were made to enforce the law it would after some time become effectual. A very large proportion of the criminal classes pass through the hands of the police every year; and if any possessed every individual of them found in possession of knife, pistol or sling-shot, they would speedily render the carrying of such toys extremely unpopular. Sometimes, the respectable citizens, those who it is well known would have such things on their persons only for the purpose of defence, might be allowed the privilege of keeping them until the ruffians were completely disarmed.

The fact is, after all, no intelligent man will believe that the police authorities could not put a stop to the carrying of deadly weapons if they were disposed to do so. As for the second of the causes we have enumerated, the want of proper appreciation of the sacredness of human life, it can, in our opinion, be reckoned as one of the bad effects of a defective and irreligious education. It is a recognized characteristic of nations in which the commercial spirit becomes predominant at the expense of the religious feeling, to look upon human life as of little value, and to sacrifice men to the god of gain.

So it appears to be here. A man is murdered, brutally murdered; a paragraph recording the circumstances is printed in the newspapers, and the great public forget all about the matter, and they are utterly indifferent as to whether justice is or is not dealt out to the assassin. But the friends of the latter are not equally indifferent. They stand to every more, they make use of every influence, to create a sympathy for him. If he or they have money, they hire the best legal talent available to turn and twist every imaginary technicality of law in his favor. When the trial comes off the incompetency or else the deliberate partisanship of the judge is pretty sure to afford grounds for an application for a second hearing of the case, if conviction should unluckily take place. If the second trial does come off, it is after such a lengthened period of time that it seems almost cold-blooded to hang the criminal, even if he be readjudged to the gallows. Commutation of sentence takes place, and the murderer is located in San Quentin. After a few years of gentle exercise in the agreeable suburban abode, he is liberated by the indiscreet "clemency" of, or, more correctly speaking, by political intrigury with, the Governor, and he quits the prison free to shoot his man whenever he pleases.

Thus then there is not a scoundrel walking the streets of San Francisco with a degree or faringer in his pocket who can dare to firmly believe that if he slays a man there are at least twenty chances for his escape, a few free or with comparatively slight punishment, to the end of his days, and that he has the manipulations of the hangman. Accordingly, he is absolutely reckless and prepared to commit murder upon the smallest provocation or for the smallest bounty. But he would not be by any means so ready with his knife or pistol if he were convinced that so sure as he shed blood so sure would he swing from the end of a rope.

From what we have been saying, therefore, it will, we think, be agreed that the very first step towards lessening to crime to our mind must be reform in the administration of justice, so that the punishment of all who commit murder shall be as swift and inexorable as fate itself. When to much is accomplished meanwhere les assassins will begin to think it imprudent to carry about them such temptations to slay their man as are attached to the possession of a deadly weapon. The next step might be the re-enactment of the statute which was so injudiciously repealed, followed by a steady and vigorous endeavor to enforce its provisions. Finally, the introduction of a wholesome morality, and a more practical observance of the precepts of religion, would infallibly eradicate every vestige of the dark stain which now disfigures our national escutcheon. But, if some steps are not taken to render life more secure from punishment than the worst criminals now enjoy, the people will take the matter into their own hands and deal with it in a summary if not in a very legal fashion.

CATHOLICITY IN SWITZERLAND.

So much attention is being directed to the persecution waged against the Church by Prussia that very little notice is taken of the way in which the Republic of Switzerland is following her bad example. Of course we would hardly expect anything better from the newly-created German Empire. Essentially despotic in Government, its leading men thoroughly imbued with the Machiavellian principle of subjecting religion to supervision by the secular power, it was in a measure only natural that Bismarck should seek to make himself as the absolute master of the souls of his subjects as he was of their bodies. In his way stood the Catholic Church, loudly avowing its divine mission, claiming allegiance from the conscience of man, and declaring itself superior to all temporal jurisdiction. Of course Kaiser Wilhelm, or rather his inspiring genius, Bismarck, must make every effort to remove the obstacle, and so he seeks to destroy the Church by persecuting its religious orders and fostering ecclesiastical schism. But it is somewhat anomalous to find a "free" and, of course, "enlightened" Republic copying the policy of a military despotism and enacting the role of a persecutor. This great Republic has been kind enough to try its hand upon a bill for the "Organization of Catholic Worship." Just fancy Congress abandoning the Credit Mobilier investigation and gravely undertaking to legislate upon church matters for the Episcopalians, Baptists or Methodists! How would their action be received throughout the country? One would certainly imagine that the Swiss Catholics could organize their own worship to suit themselves without any assistance from the Government.

But let us examine a few of the provisions of this precious piece of legislation. In the first place, henceforward all the parish priests are to be elected by the people. These laymen are constituted supreme judges of the orthodoxy and competency of their pastors. It is manifest that this is opposed to the very essence of Catholicity, and that the Church could not long exist in any place where such an order of things prevailed. Protestants would have as much a right to vote as Catholics, and we need not mention what sort of a priest they would like to elect. The minister of God would be in a short time brought down to the level of intriguing and office-seeking politicians, and in this way utter disorganization would be rendered inevitable. In the next place, all pastoral letters, bulls, briefs and Church documents of whatever nature, must be subjected to the inspection of Government officials before they may be published; and they can be suppressed altogether in case these officials think fit. It must be a mighty "reform," truly, which would place the creatures of a day in the position of censors over Catholic discipline, and enable them to prevent the words of the Holy Father from reaching the faithful for whom they are intended. Again, as Bishop's fees is to be so abridged anywhere without the consent of the Government. Sees are founded according as the requirements of the Church and the spiritual welfare of the people call for them, and it is perfectly impossible that any secular authority could properly judge either one or the other. Finally, in the city of Geneva no bishop is henceforward to reside on any account. Why the Catholics of that city, whoare yearly growing more numerous, should be by law deprived of the honor and consolation of having an episcopacy among them, is a problem that we confess our inability to solve. We know well enough why this arbitrary clause was invented. It was coined for the special purpose of legislating the expulsion of Monsignor Mermillod, whose zeal for religion and attachment to the Holy Father has earned for him the enemity of the infidels, sceptics and all the other foes of the Church.

We must acknowledge, however, that the glaring inconsistency of a pronounced "free" Government attempting to dominate and fettering the consciences of citizens, has called forth some show of remonstrance from newspapers which are bitterly anti-Catholic. Perhaps the most free from the same arbitrary spirit of which the Catholics are now the victims may at a future time, when the Government chooses to withdraw its favor, be directed against themselves. We hear, too, of one instance in which the law is working in a way never intended by its framers. In Starrkirch, a town in the South of Switzerland, a priest elected by the people—"Old Catholic"—that is to say, in plain words, a heretic—and when his superiors went to remove him and replace him by an orthodox teacher of the faith, the Swiss Government interfered and would not allow them. The election of parish priest is to come off there very shortly, and it is admitted by all parties that Mr. Gschwind, the aforementioned heretic, has not the smallest possible chance of being permitted to continue his schismatic ministrations, but will be relegated to private life, and the overwhelming majority of his parishioners. Although the law may in this particular instance work some good, it is, nevertheless, highly pernicious, and, if the Catholics submit to it, must result in great injury to the Church and great loss of souls. This is the sort of legislation to which the "free and enlightened Republic of Switzerland" treats its Catholic citizens!

WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY.

We are glad to be able to state that the Irish Regiment will parade to-day (Saturday), in honor of the birthday of Washington—over of the other military organizations will, we understand, turn out. It will any of the civic societies put in an appearance; so the demonstration will not be as imposing as it might be made. Nevertheless, we are very much pleased at the decision arrived at by the officers of the Regiment, and we think it redounds to their credit. It proves that they have very little love for the memory of the Father of his Country green in the bosoms of the living generation; and that in patriotism and attachment to the free institutions of America, they will stand second to no class of citizens, either native or naturalised. They love the land of their forefathers—they would be less than men if they did not; they are willing to shed their blood to assist in defending the Republic—they would be unworthy the uniform they wear if they were not; but the love they bear the land of their adoption, under the shelter of whose glorious flag they enjoy the blessings of liberty, is none the less on that account.

There is no conflict and there never can be between these two affections. As it has often and admirably been illustrated, the love which a tree has bears to the mother that gave him birth can never interfere with the love he entertains for the wife of his bosom. It is right that the memory of George Washington should be honored, and we are only sorry to see that his countrymen are so indifferent to it. It was one of the grandest and purest characters that have enobled humanity during the last two centuries. He was a patriot, such as there are very few to be found in America now-a-days. He understood liberty as a Christian ought to understand it; and as long as his voice had power, he proclaimed its principles in such a way as to prevent the country from falling into the old classic stamp—very different indeed from the majority of those who usurp that grand name now. Let, then, Irish lovers of liberty exhibit their respect for his memory, even though no others will.

The Catholic Sentinel of Portland comes to us this week in an enlarged form and otherwise greatly improved, typographically and editorially. We are extremely gratified at these evidences of prosperity. The Catholics of the Northern coast stood much in need of a good Catholic paper, and now that they have one we hope they will extend to it the support it deserves. Mr. H. L. Hermann, a former correspondent of The Monitor, is editor and publisher.

The telegraph reports that Father Burke lectured on "Tom Moore," at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Thursday night of this week. His health has been failing for some time past, and it is reported that he will return to Ireland to-day. On the other hand, our last Eastern exchanges say he had agreed to lecture on "George Washington" to night (22d), in Philadelphia.

The Night of the Big Wind.—We have often been asked the year of "the big wind" in Ireland. On the authority of the Irish World we will state that was 1839.

THE STATE OF EUROPE.

Nothing can be more replete with significant portents than the condition of Europe at the present day. There is scarcely a nation, large or small, powerful or weak, on the Continent which is not more or less profoundly agitated by the spirit of revolution. A republic exists in France already, and one would imagine that that circumstance would insure it against further commotion; but, unfortunately for this peace of the country, it is not radical or communistic enough to suit the ideas of the majority of the Frenchmen who misname themselves republicans. If Gambetta and his worthy confreres do not disturb the tranquility of M. Thiers, it is because he is performing a task entirely beyond their ability—paying off the indemnity and getting rid of the Germans—and as soon as he has done it they will surely make another tremendous effort to regain power. It is a great error to believe that the communistic snake was killed when the "reign of Versailles" entered Paris over the ruins of the barricades. The vile serpent was only scotched, and is now nursing its strength in order to be able to renew its attack upon humanity when the conjuncture opportunity presents itself. The reputable and law-abiding classes of Frenchmen would be perfectly satisfied with a republic like that of the United States—that is to say, a republic which would respect their rights of conscience and afford equal liberty to all—but that the Communists do not permit them to do. Accordingly they see their only chance of safety and tranquility lies in a constitutional monarchy with the Count de Chambord at its head; and there is no doubt they will establish such a Government after another sharp but decisive struggle with the "Reds."

Spain is in some respects better suited for a republic than any other country in Europe, which is the first place, its people are yet comparatively free from the taints of infidelity and socialism; so it is likely they would be guided by common sense, and not run after wild and fantastic theories of political economy. In the next place, the Spaniards have been for centuries used to popular elections under their municipal system, which is the most perfect of the kind in the Old World. In the conflict of parties the defeated one frankly accepts its fortune, hoping to do better at some future time, and does not put its arms or lines up barricades. In fact, under a Sovereign possessing the good-will and affection of the people, the present system of government is republican in nearly all its democratic enough for all practical purposes, because the whole body of officials, with a very few exceptions, are elected by ballot. We do not think the republic recently established will last, because the men at its head—who have literally snatched up, without any permission from the nation, the power—are imbued with false principles and by the unexpected and wondrous successes over France, the minor German States balled with socialism the aggrandisement of Prussia, and paid homage to the new Colossus. But they are now beginning to repent of their temerity, and to fear that they have helped to create a power whose chief ambition is to destroy their independence. Hence "particularism," as they call it, or that policy which leads to preserve the autonomy of the smaller States, is increasing in force every day. It has received considerable strength from the persecution of the Catholic Church, which Prince Bismarck was foolhardy enough to inaugurate. Ultimately it will bring about a renewal of the contest between Prussia and Austria, and the verdict given by the ordeal of battle at Sadowa may be, and in all probability will be, reversed. Russia will not, as she did before, stand neutral, but will take sides with one or other of the combatants, and the course of events would seem to indicate that she will ally herself with Prussia. France surely, and England not unlikely, will come to the assistance of Austria. Should Spain and Italy be in a position to join in the struggle, the former will range with France and the latter with Prussia. Belgium, diplomacy could modify the boundaries as above described, but they fairly represent the current of probabilities as it runs visibly now.

The upshot is, that since the days of the great Napoleon, Europe has not been in so disturbed and unsettled a state as it is today. The seeds of strife and bloodshed are scattered broadcast over the whole continent, and it is impossible to say when they should perish without coming to maturity and bearing fruit. The mighty contest between Revolution and Order, which has been raging so long for the last century, is as evidently at hand, and cannot be avoided by all the dexterity of diplomatists. It may, perhaps, be deferred for a couple of years longer, but the rare pre-sentiments of coming events Octavia and Lagena; the front steps being plumb with the sidewalk, and the rear on a line with Willow avenue—depth of 120 feet. Its former depth being greater than that of the lot, about fifteen feet had to be cut from the center in order to make it fit—irresistibly reminding us of the Vicar of Wakefield's family picture. The stable is handsomely arranged, and in all be ready for Divine service by Easter Sunday, at furthest. The whole cost of the edifice—including the price to be paid for the building, removal, alteration, etc., will be about $6,000. A brass new church of the same size and style could not be erected under $13,000, and it would be impossible to obtain for this latter sum a site so central for a parish so sparsely settled and with so few wealthy Catholics as that of Holy Cross. Under the circumstances, we consider the Council of Administration have acted wisely in the purchase of the present building, and we hope that it will be celebrated at a very early date.

THE CONVENT SCHOOLS.

On the evening of next Tuesday the Rev. Father Buchard, S. J., will deliver a lecture at St. Patrick Church, Vallejo street, at half-past seven o'clock, for the benefit of the Industrial School attached to the Convent, Powell street. He will take for his subject, "Chinaman or White Man—Which?" and will, beyond a doubt, deliver those argumentative and instructive discourse. The topic he has selected is one which we find warmly discussed in the newspapers every day, and which is commented on almost every group of citizens which happens to come together in the street. Whatever opinions may have prevailed before our Celestial friends became so numerous in the State, there is, we believe, a strong feeling in favor of the present time, and that is that their presence is highly prejudicial to the best interests of the city. But it is not to forstall Father Buchard's lecture that we refer to the matter. It is, frankly, to enlist the sympathies of our readers in the good cause he designs to sustain.

The Industrial, as we have said, on behalf of the schools attached to the Presentation Convent, Powell street. He, with the generous charity so characteristic of his countrymen and co-religionists, has for years lies in his power to raise funds wherewith to pay the taxation which the State most unjustly levies off that institution. These funds are so far from being ample that they have so far from being ample that they have so far from being ample that they have

THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

Alan, and the Lord Chancellor Cromer, also an Archbishop and Primate of Armagh, met together; the one complaining loudly of the wrong and insult done his office; the other bemoaning that all present would remember they were Christians and subjects of the Crown of England; but in the midst of this confusion Lord Thomas, taking the sword of State out of the hands of his bearer, advanced up the hall to the council table, with a lofty determination in his flashing look at once arrested all eyes.

It was plain he was about to announce his final purpose, and all within the hall awaited what he would say in sullen silence. His friends and followers now formed a dense semicircle at the foot of the hall; the lords of the council had involuntarily drawn round the throne and Chancellor's chair; Thomas stood alone on the floor opposite the table, with the sword in his hand. Anxiety and pity were marked on the various features of Cromer, who was best favored to hear what he would say; but Alan, and the treasurer, Lord James Butler, exchanged looks of malignant satisfaction.

"My lords," said Thomas, "I come to tell you that my father has been basely put to death, for, I know not what, alleged treason; and that we have taken up arms to avenge his murder. Yet, although we be thus driven by the tyranny and cruelty of the King into open hostility, we would not have it said hereafter that we have occupied like villains and cheats, but boldly declared our purpose, as becomes warriors and gentlemen. This realm, of State, my lord, is yours; not mine. I received it with an oath that I would use it for your benefit; I should stain my honor if I turned it to your hurt. My lords, I have now need of my own weapon, which I can trust; but, as for the common sword, it has flattered me and a painted scabbard, while its edge was already red in the best blood of my bou-s; sy, and is even now whetted anew for further destruction of the Geraldines. Therefore, my lords, save yourselves from as fiend upon occasion. I am no longer Henry Tudor's Deputy—I am his foe. I have more mind to conquer than to govern—to meet him in the field than to serve him in office. And now, my lords if al the hearts in England and Ireland, that have cause thereto, do but join in this quarrel, as I look that they will, then shall the world shortly be made sensible of the tyranny, cruelty, falsehood and perfidy we watch the age to come may well count this two King among the ancient traitors of most abominable and hateful memory."

"Crom aboo!" cried Neale Roe O'Kanaghy, Lord Thomas' henchman, and passed into the body of the hall at the head of the Irish soldiery. He was conspicuous over all by his height and the splendor of his native costume. His legs and arms were bare; the sleeve of his yellow cochone, partially drawn to the elbow, fell in voluminous folds around it the ground, while its skirts, girded at the loins, covered him to the knee. Over this he wore a short jacket of crimson, the sleeves just covering the shoulder, richly wrought and embroidered, and drawn around the waist by a broad belt set with precious stones, and fastened with a massive golden buckle. His head and fringed mantle was thrown back, but kept from falling by a helmet of steel like the skull-cap of Turkish pahs, which glittered on his breast. He stretched out his hand, the gold bracelets rattling as they slid back on the sinewless arm of his red-haired arm, and exclaimed in Irish: "Who is the young lion of the house of Lifley, that affrights the men of counsel, and the ruler of the nation with his noble voice? Who is the naked-up soother of Kildare, that would consume the enemies of his people and the desire of his eyes as the crest rose of Leinster? It is the son of Gerald—the top branch of the rock of Ouily—is Thomas of the silken mantle, Tomaltach-teeffy, drive Righ Bireann!"

"Righ Tomas go brugh!" shouted the soldiery, and many of the young lord's Anglo-Irish friends, responded, "Long live King Thomas!" But the Chancellor, Archbishop Cromer, who had listened to his in nanes avowal in undisguised distress, and who had already been seen to wring his hands, and even to shed tears as she, misguided nobleman and his friends thus madly invoked their own destruction, came down from his seat, and earnestly grasping the young lord by the hand, addressed him:

"Good, my lord," he cried, while his venerable figure and knees manifested at the house of Kildare, stretched as it was by infirm sryfulness of economy, seemed as mandied for a moment the attention of all present. "Good, my lord, suffer me to use the privilege of an old man's speech with you before you finally give up this assign of your ancestry and pledge of your alle. glance. I have known the friendship of your noble father, and I am bold to say there is no man in this presence, saving yourself, my Lord Thomas—for both indeed I would be to have to call you so—no one Lord of Kildare—who would more deeply deplore any injury that might befall him. Saith the report of his death, whereupon your lordship would ground your anger, what is it as bad but as shadow rumor? My lord, I cannot credit it. We of the council have had no tidings of such severity since departed for the Earl of Kildare or proceeded against him. Yet, if it be the case that God has permitted the heart of the king to be turned against his servant, that has you, my lord, are thus suddenly called upon to support the state and honor of your noble family, trust me, you ought now rather be considering how best you could discharge the grave duties of the head of such a house, and how best restore it to the dignity and half-royalty which it was than thus to run to hopeless arms in the desperate certainty of utterly de-troying all that you have left worth recruiting."

"Chorp an diaol! What says the Saxon Ollamh?" said one of the gallowglass to his neighbor.

"By the axe in my hand, Phelim Gorm," replied the other, "it seems to me that he is making a rann in praise of the old Earl—God's bad curse on them that brought him low!"

"Wheu!" cried Phelim Gorm, "have the Saxon got the art among them, as well as dock's and l-shan ?"

"If he be Lord's bard," replied the gallowglass, "he is a rhymer, and le crying his lesne—see if the cears be not running down the cha-ks! Oh, dear God! my grief! my rein! my sad misfortune!"

"Oh, my lord!" the voice of Cromer was now heard exclaiming, "the name of a king is sacred, but odious is the name of rebellion! the sun derived from heaven, and by God defended, the other forged in hell, and executed by Satan. My lord, this is no private broil, in which you might, with little hurt, give way for a time to your passion; this is a quarrel that concern the crown, that touches the nobility, that appertains to the whole commonwealth, and therefore it behooves you well before you jeopardise so many as no weighty interests, first, to see that the cause of your quarrel is certain, and then to ask whether the advantage to be gained be not outweighed by the casualty and wretchedness which this attempt, if persevered in, must produce."

"Is no e kesing, Crom," said Phelim Gorm, "is a pronouncing some rebbed stone in praise of the Satan Oge—farrah! Thomas an-teeda aboo!"

"Yeal I cannot tell," replied Con; "but he is hard or rhymer, he wears a mustache and hair longer than the wildest of O'Connor's kerns."

"Do not rightly trulsed," observed Phelim; "and to my eye it does not seem like a man's natural disease, and gift of what sage he now!"

"My lord," continued Cromer, "while the gale blows full in your sails, doubt not that divers will cleave to you, and feed upon you as worm upon their carrion; but when the storm begins to bluster, then will these same summer friends leave you like a goodly tree stranded at the ebb, or driven by the tempest ashore. Then will come imprisonment and extortion and slaunder—your arms reversed, your manors confiscated, your castles razed, your name dishonored. Weigh these, my lord, the nobility of your ancestors; remember your late father's admonition; forget not your duty to your prince, but above all, have ply on the wretched state of your poor country. Then with what heaps of curses you will be loaded when the barbarous soldier, let loose in these ware, shall plunder the poor subject, consuming the widow's portion and inheritance of the fatherless, leaving the city forlength and breadth; ay, and so adamanging upon the nation as they are now by those who shall last smart for it. My lord, the King is a vessel of grace and mercy, and your offense is not overbearing; cleave to his clemency—it is not yet too late. Oh, my lord, I pray you, by the duty you bear for the love of God, for the duty you bear your prince, for the regard you bear your country, and the respect you would have for your own safety, abandon this headlong field and return to your allegiance!"

"My Lord Chancellor," replied Thomas, "I came not here to take advice, but to give you to understand what I purpose for do. As loyalty would have me know my prince, so duty compels me to reverence my father. I thank you heartily for your counsel; but it is now too late. As to my fortune, I will take it as God sends it, and rather choose to die with valor and liberty, than live under King Henry in bondage and villiany. Wherefore, my lord, I thank you again for the concern you take in my welfare, and since you will not receive this sword out of my hands, I can but cast it from me, as I have cast off and renounce all duty and allegiance to your master." So saying he flung the sword of state upon the council table. The blade sacred a hand's breadth out of the sheath, and the sublance with which it was de-bed out of his hands. He then, in the midst of a tumult of acclamations from his followers, and cries of sorrow and pity from the lords and privates around, tore off his robes of office and cast them at his feet. Stripped tone of his ensigns of dignity, Lord Thomas Fitzgerald stood up, amid the wreck of his splendor, and seemed and looked almost like a greyhound, equipped in complete mail, before the representatives of England and Ireland. The cheering of his adherents was loud and enthusiastic, and when they could be again silenced, Thomas continued:

"Iarrah, farrah!" shouted Neale Roe O'Kennedy, in a voice of thunder; "it is Thomas!" the skirt of iron that his lower [illegible] like the bright steel from his breath of velvet like the brand from its cloak of sables! like the red flashing and consuming fire of Innes out of the scattered clouds of the sky!—The sword of Erin is now in the hand of Desmond's fire, strong and sudden, burning and blasting, and wasting and inevitable!—Rise around him, sons of Gerrels! shout for the Mac an Earla Mora! [Sons of the great Earl!] Thomas! by your leaping spears, children of the chase; we must soon follow the sight of battle and slaughter across the wild dog's den; cast away your bows of chase, ye hunters of the plains of Leinster, we must have a prey to day with the shot of guns and cannons in the nest of dragons and in the lair of the dun deer on lion! Iarrah, farrah! Crooss aboo!"—and carrying the Geraldine war-cry, he rushed into the council, his red locks flaming over the heads of the clansmen like a torch.

By this time the lords of the connell were dispersed by the doors at the throne end of the hall, for Lord Thomas, with the same chivalrous generosity that induced him openly to withdraw his allegiance, had permitted them to escape unmolested in a solemn parley. His friends now gathered round him to consult on their proceedings.

"My lord, if we get out the first word with his Holiness and the Emperor," said Sir Oliver Flaggeald to his nephew, "that pestilent father, Alan, will have the start of us, and mar our hopes of success from the continent."

"Right, uncle," said Thomas, "it shall be looked to; but first let us summon White to render up the castle."

"Your lordship will hardly bandits the keys of Dublin Castle now without blows," said Le Poer.

"Well, then, if we must take them by force of arms, let us fall to without delay," cried Thomas.

"The citizens are ill affected towards us," observed Sir Richard Wogan; "I question much whether they will suffer us to place our batteries within the walls; and from Sheep street and the south, across the city ditch, we would assault the place to a manifest disadvantage."

"Ha!" cried Sir Oliver, "fore God it is true; the perching church do hate us heartily; yet it would not get them will, by fair means or by foul, White may baffle us for a good while yet."

"I'll tell you what, my lord," said Bursel, "although I advised against this course, I will do it what a true man may to aid you out of it. From my poor house of Ballygriffen I hold, as it were, the keys of Fingal; the granary of Dublin. Now, my lord, send a flag to the citizens, and give them to understand that if they will not open the ship's artillery a friendly reception, I will close the doors of their market-house while a bushel of corn remains in Meath."

"It is well said," cried Lord Thomas. "Let us send to the knave as Master Bursel advises. Pares, wit thou and Sir John Talbot do us this service?"

"Willingly, my lord," said Pares; and Talbot, conscious of his having been the chief adviser of a course that was already becoming to be hated by gratuitous difficulties, and unwilling to exhibit further dissatisfaction, ale- consented. His dislike of Pares was, if possible, increased since he had heard his disho-orable sentiments in the di-pute about giving up the sword, and his passions, ruffled as they had been, by successive excitements, were still unallayed, and with d-ifficulty kept under. As they received their instructions, he could plainly perceive that all those who had been opposed to him in that dispute regarded him with evident distrust; while many of the rest, beginning to feel the difficulty into which their rashness had involved them, hung back, or muttered their acknowledgments of late reproaches.

Again, riding side by side, with dark brows and averted glances, the rivals silently and sullenly marched on their mission. The gates at the farther end of the bridge were closed, and a gun was run out from the embrasure above as they advanced.

"Give the word, or I sh-ot!" cried a bulky citizen, showing his bluestock above the breech of the falcon.

"How chuf, who trusted thee with a gun, that know not a flag of truce from a royal standard?" cried Talbot. "Open thy gate, sirrah, quickly! We come on business for your burghers."

"Stand! parley!" exclaimed the angry citizen, vainly striving to bring the piece to bear upon Talbot's men who were close under the walls. "Traitor and rebel! I'll teach thee to revile the city authorities! Have ber up, my masters—I'll blow the bankrupt coxcombs into the Liffy!"

"Stop thy vaud, g od Master Harvey," cried Talbot with a sneer; "the recoil of the piece will burst thy girdle on my honor, master draper, I know you not, else I had not used these contemptuous terms to Joan Butler's husband's son and need thy forgiveness

MISCELLANEOUS IRISH NEWS.

Faction fights have been very frequent in East Limerick of late.

Castlebar will be retained as a regular station for troops, though Galway is chosen as the Connaught Depot Centre.

At the recent Home Rule meeting in Manchester, Mr. Heuressy stated that there were 46,000 Irish voters on the register in the metropolis.

The Month's Mind for the late Rev. J. Sheehan, P.P. and V. G., Enniskymon, was celebrated with the solemnity in the Catholic church of that town.

An attempted agrarian outrage lately occurred within a short distance of Castlebar. A man named Egan was twice fired at through the windows of his house. His escape was miraculous.

It is announced that Mr. Chichester Fortescue has been raised to the peerage, and that Sir G. Bowyer and Mr. A. M. Sullivan will be candidates for the representation of Louth, thus rendered vacant.

Mr. Anthony Canny, steward to the Earl of Leitrim, has been personally threatened with death if he attempted to eject any tenants on that estate. The man who made this threat fired three shots in the air and was allowed to go away.

Much sensation has been produced in local commercial circles in Cork by the failure of an old-established firm in the milling trade, carrying on business both in the county and in the city. The liabilities are esteemed at £70,000.

On the 11th January several prosecutors of weavers carrying fire, entered Ballymena, and proceeded to the Brown Linen Market, where a very large attended meeting was held. The object of the demonstration was to indict on an increase of wages, and an agreement to make the webs of a certain length.

The body of the missing policeman, Subconsable Alexander, was found on Saturday evening, January 11, floating in the Shannon, opposite Limerick creek, a few miles from Limerick. Deceased was a married man, and is supposed to have committed suicide.

The opening year offers good augury to every lover of Catholic Ireland. Contrasted with other countries and former times, Ireland, at the close of the old and the beginning of the new year, presents a picture of almost universal freedom from crime, and the addresses of the different chairman at the quarter sessions are one chorus of congratulation on the peaceful state of the country.

The Drogheda Argus says the high price of materials and of labor to which nowspaper proprietors are now subjected is causing them a good deal of anxiety. How to raise the price of a paper seems to be a difficult question to solve. Before the sheets are taken out of the bales they cost the proprietor more than we pay for them when printed, and the expense of carrying on the papers is thrown entirely upon the advertisers.

The Athy correspondent of the Leinster Reporter writes: We now subjected to assume that his Grace the Duke of Leinster has received a letter from Mr. Gladstone, in which the Premier expresses his entire disapproval of Irish landlords interfering with the spirit of the Land Act. He further states that if the course recently adopted by some landlords be persisted in, it will give rise to the necessity of again bringing the subject before Parliament with the view of dealing with a class of having the Irish Land Act remodeled on such lines as to prevent any further agitation on the part of the tenantry."

The Limerick Chronicle says: "I have heard men of almost patriarchal age corroborate each other with the statement that the hotelessness of this winter, observing that such a wet and boisterous season was unknown in their memory for recollection. Within the last two months there has been a downpour, following close upon the heels of another, to the destruction. Owing to this state of things, relief meetings have been held throughout the country for the purpose of ameliorating the condition of the destitute by procuring fuel, etc., to alleviate their sufferings."

The late Land Act, interpreted by the light of the experience gained during the short time it has been in operation, seems, at the estimation of the public, to have fallen far short of the reasonable expectations of those who long struggled to obtain a just settlement, upon an equitable basis, of the vexed question of the relations between landlord and tenant. This is evidenced by the remarkable fact that in almost every county in Ireland in which they had not already existed, of Tenant Defence Associations have been formed, and that, as far as possible, by united cooperation, such rights as the Land Act conferred, and endeavor, by Parliamentary action, to amend its defects and supplement its shortcomings.

The Limerick Reporter has issued a proclamation transferring a number of islands, hitherto belonging to the county of Mayo, to the neighboring county, and more conveniently situated county of Galway. These islands are Inishbofin, Inishshark, Inishdalla, Inishskinnymore, Doongarula, Glassillanbeisty, Gun Rock, Foul Rock, Lisnaboe, Inishlyon, Carrickbeilla, Glassillanstone, Stags of Boda, Glassillanbeisty, Inishlyon, Inishbofin, Bongoll, Oogheurreo, Doonoeneapella, Inishgort, together with the mainland, Cleggan, in the parish of Inishbofin. The islands are annexed to the county of Galway, and for all electoral, registration and other purposes, to be part of the county of Galway, from the 1st of February.

Mr. Bright gives us an insight into his mind on the subject of the land question by the following extract from an important letter of the late Mr. Cobden, which has excited a wonderful degree of interest all over England. Mr. Bright would break up the present system of land tenure and establish a small proprietary on the principle which built up the nationhood of France after the revolution of 1782. He would make the agricultural laborers of England, and the other small farmers, proprietors in fee, attached to the best interests of the realm. He coincides in the views promulgated by Mr. Cobden in this letter; and as regards the Irish land question, we believe Mr. Bright would do the same, and by doing the same in relation to Ireland he would take the most important step to raise this country to the level in the scale of nations, and afford such positive security for the public peace and the security of the Crown, as no coercive or restrictive laws, or all the bayonets of the British army could possibly advance. The Irish agricultural laborers deserve every consideration.

Brother Lynch died at the Christian Brother's Monastery, in Cork, on 31 January, after a lingering illness, deeply regretted.

Bennett's Cyclopedia is the best and cheapest book drawing in the world. It promotes the growth of the heart, and is entirely free from all sectarian matter. The name and the title thereof is adopted as a trade mark, to secure the genuine and proprietors against imitations by the introduction of spurious articles. All unauthorized use of the trade mark will be promptly prosecuted.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

AMADOR COUNTY.

The Ledger of the 15th says the lessees of the Hickey mine are industriously at work cleaning out the old shafts and getting ready to take out rock. The mine is looking splendidly, and has every indication of paying well.

CALAVERAS.

The Chronicle of the 15th has the following information: The golden stream continues to pour substantially daily from the two mines. The yield last week was $7,400, an average of $1,284 per day. An immense body of the quality of ore now being crushed is in sight—enough to keep the batteries steadily at work for a year.

The Shaw claim, under the ownership of Mr. Burgess, is paying handsomely.

The new rich chimney in the 100-foot south level of the Sanderson holds well as the level is being extended. Ten ore on the dump shows considerable free gold.

The lower tunnel of the Hetzer mine is developing one of the largest fissures in the district.

Two new chimneys have been discovered on an old mine near the Butcher ranch, the property of A. M. Harris. The ore is from one to three feet thick and will average near $50 per ton.

The granite vein is gigantic in proportions. A lot of unassorted ore taken from a space of twelve feet wide, across the vein, paid a fraction over $9 per ton, leaving similar ore on each side; no defining walls have been found.

TUOLUMNE.

The Republican of the 14th says: Our mining interests have not looked so favorable for years as they do now at the present time. Many new mines are being opened, while every deserted mine, and many old ones are being more practically worked than heretofore, with results highly satisfactory.

The Creighton mine is paying largely at present, considering the small expense at which it is worked.

A new shaft recently sunk in the Robinson mine, at Prospect Hill, has struck a rich gravel bed, which assures the richest yield of anything yet in this claim, greatly beyond former expectations.

The new Shepard and Witten claim continues to look better and better. They now say that with rock in the rear of the Eglesia claim, that is very rich. It will crush $100 or more to the ton, we should say.

FRESNO.

The Expositor says during the month of December the No Plus Ultra Copper Mining Company shipped 20 tons of ore from their mine to San Francisco, to test the practicability of working it, and the results have been most satisfactory. After paying expenses of taking out the ore, and freight and charges, the net returns realized $235 per ton. The company have plenty of ore in sight now, and with a higher rate of freight they would be enabled to ship ore which are now laid aside. The mine is situated about twelve miles from the railroad, and, should the narrow-gauge road be built, will be nearly on its line. The copper mines about Buchanan are, we learn, returning fair profits.

MARIPOSA.

The Idaho mine, in Green Valley, running thirty-five stamps, cleans up, from its ten compartments, an average of one ounce of $20,000, or over $3,000 a day, and the Eureka mine, with ten stamps and a ton of ore to the day, has been cleaning up $12,000 or $6,000 a day.

PLACER.

The Colfax Gazette is from the Herald's pen, and has not two years ago Mr. Quinn purchased a half ledge on Dear river ditch, near Gold Hill, and repaired the mill and worked the ledge. Of late he has been doing things in working order and the ledge fairly open, but since the water has been shut off he has been kept to work and has paid upfor the mill and mine, and the ledge is now paying from $22 to $25 per ton regularly.

SAN DIEGO.

The San Diego Union has the following from Julian: Richer rock is now being taken out of the Golden Chariot mine than has ever been taken out before. The ledge is from five to six feet in width.

The hoisting works of the Stonewall mine have been set up. Several hundred tons of rock have been stored in the mine awaiting hoisting.

Whitney's mill is at present engaged in crushing about thirty tons of rock per day from the Whitney ledge, which will yield from $100 to $190 per ton. Wilson's saw mill is employed full time in manufacturing lumber, for which there is an extraordinary demand—so much so that the mill is unable to supply it.

The shaft of the Helvetia mine is down about 150 feet, and a drift has been run three feet in width, and contains ore yielding from $25 to $30 per ton.

NEVADA.

The Cloverdale Bee says: There is some excitement here relative to quartz, and men from one to another are constantly going to neighboring hills and ravines the past week or two. Some persons report rich finds, and the excitement is intense. We have heard of several promising discoveries having been made within a few days past, and the latest few days; and some of the old locations in that direction are developing unexpectedly rich. Considerable attention has been particularly directed to the Star of the Union, which, it is again running with regularity, and the vast accumulations of bullion of the last two months are beginning to move out—but, however, in large quantities, as the stage company are not yet in a condition to haul large loads. About $75,000 in value was shipped during the week."

The Malva Tree.

The Alta has discovered a new and valuable tree, or rather has discovered the beneficial uses of a tree already well known to most gardeners—the malva. It is a hardy, quick-growing plant, and, according to the Alta, will grow in any place, no matter whether wet or dry. It does not even require planting; will grow from seed carelessly thrown on the ground, and in five years attains the height of thirty feet. It blooms for nine months in the year, and bees prefer its blossoms to flowers, while cattle prefer its leaves to clover, and give richer and better milk while feeding on it. Of these leaves there is a perpetual growth, a new one sprouting out as fast as the old one falls or is taken off. Besides, it prevents fevers. Its bark yields a fiber which is capable of every use to which flax is put, and is in many respects superior to flax. The Alta says that "one acre of these trees, after the first growth, will yield ten times the amount of fiber that one acre of flax would, and with this advantage, that little or no labor is required," and it thus sums up its advantages:

"Thus we have a tree which will aid in bringing rain to the parched counties in Southern California and the treeless plains, which will feed the cattle and bees, and which will also produce an article of immediate commercial value in its fiber. Many of the new barren hillsides could be covered with a dense growth of this valuable tree in five years, while the second year's growth cattle and sheep could be allowed to feed upon them with safety. Once such a tree is set out, it grows and embarrass productives that the leaves will care for themselves. It is a spring in perpetuity.

If one quarter of the above is true, this is just the tree wanted to plant in the San Joaquin Valley, and in the counties of Los Angeles and San Diego, as well as in the valleys of Arizona Nevada and New Mexico.

More Profitable than Wheat.

The Post sensibly remarks: "The expense of getting their wheat to market should admonish the farmers of California of the superiority of turning their attention to some other crop. The exceptional high prices which have ruled in England last year, and which will rule this year, cannot be steadily maintained, and a favorable season will be sure to find our farmers with an immense crop which will yield them no profit. But the fact that the Pacific Coast has always grown and grow them year at present prices with much larger profit. Two years ago a board of several promising discoveries having been made within a few days past, and the latest few days; and some of the old locations in that direction are developing unexpectedly rich. Considerable attention has been particularly directed to the Star of the Union, which, it is again running with regularity, and the vast accumulations of bullion of the last two months are beginning to move out—but, however, in large quantities, as the stage companies are not yet in a condition to haul large loads. ## In Memory of Miss Kate Griffin,

WHO DIED JANUARY 31, 1873.

There is mourning along the Blackwater,
There is weeping in fond old Fermoy,
There are tears strewn o'er the water,
There are prayers ushered morning the sky.

There is weeping in the cottage,
Sang charity, happy and gay,
For Kitty's gone to the Heavenly Father
Where the Peacheon robs by rains grey.

You ask me why the overflowing
Of Heaven and earth in their tears?
It is Death who a flower has been mowing
In the bloom of its beauty and years.

She died in the land of the stranger,
Far away o'er Atlantic's wild wave,
And she sleeps her last sleep free from danger,
Where no foe can molest or enslave.

No father stood weeping in sorrow,
No mother to close her dear eyes,
No brother was present to borrow
The tears that in anguish arise.

Yet there was a friend with tenderest care,
Till her spirit had taken its flight,
And watched o'er her with fondest care,
Like a guardian angel of light.

And friends, whether absent or near,
Forgive me in this sad hour,
That the soul whom in life we loved dear
Is taken to Heaven's bright bower.

Dear parents, kind brothers and sisters,
Dear Father, Mother and Sister,
Imagine Hope soothingly whispers,
It was always her favorite word.

May her fond memory come like a vision,
May we live that we may enjoy
The sphere in which she's now living,
Of Kate, the pride of Fermoy.

THE MEMORY OF A SONG.

The heart grows cold as years depart,
As if friendship fades as life grow by;
But there are memories of the heart
That change and thus arise defy,
And only with memories can die.

These ones have gone their annual round
Since I, enthralled, heard thy strain;
But yet remembrance wakes the sound,
And quivering o'er my heart again
The music of thy soft refrain.

In years that are forever fled,
No vale, mellifluous, like lay,
But words which in the soul's breakings fell
Of hope and country, and poetry
How dear they were, how fair they be!

The words of one fatherless, exiled,
On foreign shores, and sorrow-worn;
Who weeping by their waters wild,
Under the willows hung his mute lyre,
Thus mourned for his native land.

O native sun! O native tree!
Ah, shall not my fond heart be glad,
And sad my eyes, when I behold ye,
And my trained soul to love you more?
Ah, shall I not be blest to see
Ground so dear, once more?

The world's sprinkle peaceless flee,
And to its petty cares are fled;
I stand on Tara's monarch hill,
Around me green hills, vales and streams,
The saints who prayed, the bards who bled.

The war-blast sounds by stream and glen—
Once more my country's foes are met—
I hear the march of patriot men,
I see the battle's terrible array,
Of heroes—child thyself! Arise!

Rise! crushing tyranny and wrong,
By soul, that with thy terms agrees,
Be present by the banner strong,
As if some words waving in the breeze,
Or sunbeam's color summoned it.

While from thy rounded lips the streamed
The poesy of ancient chivalrous song,
Thine eyes a gentle fervor breathed,
Thine every accent thrilled the ear,
Upon some surging roll below.

My native—fell upon a tongue
Hath waked the music of thy strand;
Forever fairer shalt thou be,
Thine airs so simple, yet so grand,
My native, my native land!

"THE LIBERATOR."

A MAGNIFICENT LECTURE.

WENDELL PHILLIPS ON O'CONNELL.

[From the New York Irish-American.]

CONCLUDED.]

George Canning went into his grave, and fought till the day of his death for Catholic Emancipation; and when Canning had passed to his death, the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel, whom he was on the side of the Tories, became terrified, and bound their brows with the laurels that belonged to Canning. It was in that opposition that he proved to the world that they wreathed their wreath for him. So, too, in this case, the disestablishment of the Church, the alienation of the masses, and the taming of the land—the three great coronal moves on the chessboard which contribute to the claims of Gladstone to statesmanship in Irish affairs. Henry Grattan besieged the English Government by a life long begging for those very three. When the Melbourne Administration came into office, they promised O'Connell all that, and shut his lips. His closed Constitution Hall, stopped his agitation; and he brought his followers to sustain the Melbourne Administration, and supported the Government on all occasions. In a word, when he moved supporter of the Government, and nothing else but a supporter of the Government, waiting, believing that the Englishmen would do them justice in all when very proper to call attention and moderation, ever believing the English Premier's perfect appreciation of the cause, and trusting that English statesmanship would see it. So he remained. And when that wretched failure had destroyed the Melbourne Administration he again took up the old agitation in the strongest form. But, instead of an empty declaration, "Repeal is the most remarkable man that the history of the last 100 years in England has called out: and in this respect

HE CARRIED ON HIS AGITATION.

Agitation, you know, is an old world with a new meaning, which Sir Robert Peel defined to be an appeal to the conscience of a people in behalf of its rights. It was an appeal to the thought and principle of a community on the principle of common sense; a common sense to reform, abused and ancient political action. Abolitionists were agitators, and were outside politics to court public opinion, only that they should return and press the Government into its failure. Mr. Lloyd Garrison fairly claimed the merit of having organised, as he had stated, that great movement. He learned his lesson at the feet of Daniel O'Connell. When Richard Cobden, defining the law in the commercial crisis of the close of Great Britain, took the tax from bread and sent it down precisely to the sum of sixpence tollers, he learned his trade at the feet of Daniel O'Connell. Wilberforce, before him, had made a sublime attempt—a superficial example—to cherish it; but Daniel O'Connell was the first man that ever actually laid himself on the hearts of the masses. When, in 1798 and 1801, he first pledged himself to the impossibility, as he said, of Ireland and the privates of Ireland said, "It is not in our power to achieve it." The hierarchy of the Church held aloof from him, and said, "We have seen our flock led up a hundred times within three or two hundred years; and we have no heart for a second effort." No peers before him; no Parliament behind him; no Government; no Whig support; standing on the soil with the blood of their ancestors poured out, humiliated, ignorant beyond description, crushed as the dust soaked with the blood of their ancestors and disheartened for the moment. The Tories had triumphed in Ireland. They said, "We have struggled for half a dozen generations. It is better to sit down content." All the nobility were on the one side, and the hierarchy of the Church on the other; and O'Connell said, "I will model the hearts of four millions of hearts into brotherhood to demolish the omnipotence of Great Britain;" and he did it. He laid down, for the first time in history, the great corner principle of the constitutional method. He said, "No political change is worth the shedding a drop of human blood." England had covered Ireland with her redcoats; every commanding point was held by cannon; and O'Connell looked in the face of, such a Government—panoplied in complete steel, from top to toe, from head to foot, and renewed his pledge:

"I WILL NEVER DRAW THE SWORD."

France, when she wants to gain a step, draws the sword. France, with a shattered political idea, throws the king out of his throne. England walked forward in her dominant, unbroken progress: called out, "I will not talk—I do not want to argue with you," until she had got her inspiration. He was the first man that rebuked the instinctive groupings and thought of England into a system. He said to his own another pen: "Nothing is politically right that is morally wrong." Its undermining of principles for success: no denying one truth to help another: no taking a step from the devil's gospel of compromise," no earnest is this country. His creed was—"I will succeed by a fair development of all the truths that God shows me, or I will not succeed at all." That is the difference between the politician, who reaps the harvest of to-day, and the agitator—he who plants for to-morrow. You know what William H. Seward said—[I told you the story two years ago.] Sitting with an antislavery friend in his parlor, Seward said to him—and Seward was the great, finished exemplification of the perfect politician of his age; his whole life seemed to me the claims of the artist, unmistaking politician; and he never made a mistake, until his brain was darkened by the first gun from Sumter—he said to his friend, "Tell me the purpose and method." His anti-slavery friend explained them to him; and, when he had ended, Seward said: "Well, now we are all right. Your method, with you, is the correct view of the question." His wife, who sat near, called out to him: "Why, William, I never heard you say anything that pleased me so much." The old politician turned quickly to her and said: "My dear, you do not suppose, now, that I would touch a foot on the ground that outside this room?" Of course not. He had he done that, he would have ceased to be the politician—the reaper of the ripe harvest; the representative of accepted opinion; he would have become the agitator.

O'CONNELL PLANTED SEED FOR THE FUTURE.

The first time I ever had the honor to meet Seward was in the United States Court. I had made a speech the night before on public opinion; and he came to me and said: "I have read your speech; that's all true. Go round, my young friend; make speeches to ripen and educate public opinion, and you know I will make use of it for myself." It was exactly the description of the function of the politician. O'Connell was the first man that ever marked out the limits and solemnly devoted himself to the work of an agitator. Standing, after his death twenty years, and today, measuring the means within his hand, the command, no man in history ever did so much, measuring the means he used. You know I may claim for him, as for Grattan—for he was only Grattan's counterpart and pupil—that he established every movement which the British statesman is led to adopt to-day. Ireland had died for half a dozen centuries waiting for the better vest to ripen. And O'Connell knew the very things that England timidly attempts to propose to-day. When O'Connell first commenced his career—finding the hall closed against all agitation—he said, "If nine men will meet me at the Dublin Hotel at nine o'clock, on such a day, I will commence an agitation for the repeal of Catholic disabilities." When that hour came there were only seven men in the room, and after waiting till four, O'Connell went down into the street, mixed two rusty prisons by the shoulders, dragged them into the room, locked the door, put the key in his pocket, and had his nine men. Very naturally you may laugh, but before three ten men who met in an upper room—two of them prisoners—the proudest Government in Europe and the most selfish—with the Duke of Wellington at their head—was rendered within twenty years. O'Connell started out with infinite patience to plant the seed of Irish opinion. Lord Russell says, "Patience is the passion of great souls." And it has been emphatically true of O'Connell. If there is any key to his successive success it is certainly the patience with which

HE PERSEVERED IN HIS METHOD.

He said, at this time, "I have no weapon, no sword, but the Irish 'boden.' I should have no fulcrum for my lever if England did not give me the 'coden.'" Now, that code, I am glad to say, Mr. Froude acknowledges in all its length, as hideous. You know that, by the Irish code, they could not vote or sit in the House of Commons; he could not hold any command from the Crown, he could not hold civil or military office; he could not

SECRET SOCIETIES.

Some days ago the Chronicle had a very sensible editorial on "Secret Societies," which contained these two assertions: "In the present age of the world, and in America, secret societies are institutions of very questionable propriety and of very doubtful utility;" and, "There is certainly no occasion for secret political societies under a Government whose political privileges are within the reach of all, where the freedom of the press is unrestricted, where speech is free and personal liberty is unrestrained." Our contemporary further stated its opinion that "The right to hold office should not be affected by any form of religious belief, unless it is clearly proved that religious associations shall themselves combine to interfere in the administration of our civil affairs."

A correspondent, signing himself "Vigilance," who is evidently a member of the "American Protestant Association," or else of its upper house, "The Order of the Crescent," writes to the above-mentioned paper to prove the necessity of secret political organization for the purpose of preventing the spread of the Catholic Church throughout the United States, and of preventing Catholics from holding offices under the Government. Of course he is full of the idea that the Church is hostile to liberty, although it has for years been fighting revolution, the arch-agency of all liberty, civil and religious; and he believes that the ascendancy of Catholic influence in this country would prove the downfall of our free institutions, although it is beyond dispute that Catholics have in every crisis through which the Republic has been found true and faithful patriot soldiers.

"Vigilance" pretends to agree in the main with the Chronicle, but considers that reference to secret societies as contradicting in effect other, and therefore the more political constitutional provisions, is fallacious. He does not venture to give any proof of the existence of "the power of the Catholic Church" in matters so instinct as business of any Catholic religious association meddling, but proceeds to ... the individuality of Catholics, their religious principles and their Church, as ... Secret societies are the only weapon employed by such scribblers when assailing the Catholic Church. Now, if there is any strongly marked characteristic in our religious communities it is, plainly, the ... Catholic, or the falling away of a Catholic from the true faith into heresy or schism? In neither case does the Church even pretend to dethrone, depose, or in any way meddle with the Government of the country. Her power was exercised occasionally by the Popes at a time when the princes of the earth were all Catholics, and recognized the Papacy as an arbitrating tribunal between them and their subjects. And history shows that in every instance in which this power was exercised it acted well and wisely for the prevention of civil war, for the safety of the people and for the progress of human liberty. But the condition of society has vastly changed since then. Most of the kings and princes have fallen away from the Church, and of those who profess devotion to it, but few would acknowledge the authority of the Pope in this particular matter. So, the "deposing power," like many another faculty once beneficent, has fallen into disuetude, and nothing is more unlikely than that we shall see it exercised in our day or generation.

But the great argument of "Vigilance" is that the Catholic Church teaches the doctrine that the secular order is subordinate to the spiritual. He attempts to make something terrible out of this, and yet it is only the expression of a great truth—namely, that the laws of God are of greater force than the laws of men. Every Church founded upon Christianity must claim to be to its members the highest interpreter of the laws of God. It must, therefore, to be logical claim that any law or ordinance of the State conflicting with its tenets is not binding on its members. This is precisely asserting the supremacy of the spiritual over the secular order.

What are the "rights of conscience" so much talked about now and again? They are the supposed rights of every man to worship Almighty God after whatever fashion pleases him, and to place his own interpretation upon the divine laws. The Puritan "forefathers," so frequently ploddy alluded to by New England fanatics, quitted England because they believed their "rights of conscience" were abridged. They firmly believed in the supremacy of the spiritual over the secular order, and they certainly taught that any law which ran counter to their peculiar tenets was not only null and void, but was actually sinful in the observance.

In fact, it is attested by all history that every denomination of Christians claimed that its tenets should be subordinate to the Divine law as interpreted by their creed; and only outblinking or else ignorant fanatics would venture to make the profession of that doctrine a reproach. Catholics, Methodists if the Congress of the United States passed a law directly contrary to their religious principles? Would they fly to revolution. And here we may remark that Catholics, on account of their great horror of revolution, would be the more submissive citizens. They would denounce, they would protest, they would strain every nerve to influence public opinion; but they would not shed blood or create a civil war. They would prefer to convince the hearts of their adversaries by argument and expostulation. This is no empty boast. It is of this assertion. No Catholic there is no Protestant sect in existence possessing one-tenth of the strength of the Catholic Church in Germany or Italy that would endure persecution, and would allow their religious communities to be plundered and exiled as our corligionists have done, without flying into rebellion and making bonfires of their red with the flames of burning cities.

Again, the framers of our Constitution believed and taught that the political power should be subordinate to the religious, when they declared that it should not be within the competency of Congress to pass any law interfering with the free exercise of religion. This principle has become incorporated with our political system, and would, if occasion arose, be asserted to-morrow in our Courts. Suppose, for instance, that Archbishop Alemany removed one of his parish clergy for preaching an erroneous doctrine, and that deprived him of the emoluments derivable from his position; and suppose that the suspended priest were foolish enough to appeal to the courts to reinstate him, on the grounds that he had been unjustly dismissed—what would be the result? His case would be dismissed. He would be told that he had no legal or personal charge against Archbishop Alemany, and that his ecclesiastical superiors, and not the government, were the judges whether he was still a Catholic or not. A case similar to our hypothetical one has already been decided in the East. There, then, is a practical confession that the State has no right to meddle with the internal discipline of any religious organization. All the "supremacy" that the Catholic Church claims here or anywhere else is the acknowledgment of the incompetency of the secular power to frame any legislation restricting the liberty or impeding any of its functions. And we may tell "Vigilance," as the rick of shocking him, that she has enjoyed that supremacy here from the beginning, and will continue to enjoy it as long as the republic lasts. It will, we think, be agreed by all sensible people that nothing but stupid prejudice could induce a man to charge against the Catholic Church as a crime, or at least as an unavailable assumption, that which is, in fact, equally claimed by every other Christian denomination—which has been fully recognized and provided for by the founders of our glorious Constitution, and which has the guarantee of every law court in the land.

Now as regards the other "supremacy," the supremacy of influence and of numbers, that is coming and must come, despite all assertions of cliques of conspirators, d...

THE MODOC WAR.

If the so called "Modoc War" had not caused the deaths of many brave men, we would be inclined to style it nothing better than a disgraceful farce. But, as it has been too much tragedy about the affair to warrant one in treating it in so light a fashion. Certainly the lives of a couple of score half naked and wholly starved Indians engaging in a war with the power of the United States, is in itself ridiculous enough: yet, when we consider that their mad action was caused by injustice and oppression, we are compelled in regard to the conduct of the Eastern States the people of California are supposed to be animated with an intense hatred of the Indians, and so think very little of other wrongful or slaying them whenever opportunity offers. The bare reflection of such a calumny is to be found in ... anxious that peace should be compelled as quickly as possible on terms honorable to the Government and satisfactory to the Indians. There was no cry for blood, no declaration of war to the knife with the "red-skin," and ... fled by the name of secret political associations. Americans are a liberal-minded and highly intelligent people. They love truth, they love order, they love religion. They are inclined to favor only that form of Christianity which recommends itself to their intelligence, as the one which best accords with the teachings of Christ and His apostles. We, of course, hold firmly that Catholicity, and none other, is that one; and therefore we hold, as a logical deduction, that Americans, as a nation, will ultimately embrace it. We dare say all the sects, from Episcopalians down to the Freethinkers and Spiritualists, entertain the same expectation; and, though we may laugh at their folly, we do not blame them. If they think that they are in possession of the true faith, it is only natural that they should like to see it prevail; to the exclusion of all others. But, as we have remarked before arguing on purely human reason, without reckoning the infinite power of divine grace, which must, of course, be on the side of the infallible and indefectible church, it is as absolutely certain that the Americans will accept Catholicity as fully as they will accept every new development in natural science. Truth is powerful and will prevail, even when refusing to avail of any weapons but those of argument. Prejudice, backed by physical power, may resist her for a length of time, but her triumph is inevitable, and it must come.

The petty meanness of "Vigilance" which finds alarming proof of "the nefarious means of Romanism" in the report, issued upon what he naively styles "information," that the majority of the teachers in the public schools are Catholics, is so despicable that we only mention it in order to afford some clue to the character of the "Order." If we were to deal at the length they deserve with all the sophistries contained in his letter to the Chronicle, it would exclude everything else from our columns, so we must drop him for the present.

Prejudice, backed by physical power, may resist her for a length of time, but her triumph is inevitable, and it must come.

The petty meanness of "Vigilance" which finds alarming proof of "the nefarious means of Romanism" in the report, issued upon what he naively styles "information," that the majority of the teachers in the public schools are Catholics, is so despicable that we only mention it in order to afford some clue to the character of the "Order." If we were to deal at the length they deserve with all the sophistries contained in his letter to the Chronicle, it would exclude everything else from our columns, so we must drop him for the present.

THE FORTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

The Forty-second Congress of the United States has died a natural death, and yet died infamously. It expired by effluxion of time, but the closing scenes of its existence were the very reverse of edifying. At the present moment the papers of the whole country, almost without distinction of party, are filling with fierce denunciations of its deliberate failure to deal out justice to those implicated in the Credit Mobilier frauds. It is believed upon good grounds that the Government—or, to speak more correctly, the people—have been robbed of about forty millions of dollars through the agency of the organised band of thieves which constituted the Credit Mobilier company. It has been proved, beyond shadow of doubt, that Senators and Representatives received "shares" of the company and drew "dividends" while they were engaged in legislation upon matters affecting the interests of the organization. If this does not amount to corruption and bribery, the very idea of the nature of such things entertained by the great majority of mankind must be given up altogether, and we must seek new definitions for them. When the rumors of Congressional rascality was first started a great deal of plausible ingenuity was employed to prove that it was hoped that the House would quickly expel the members whose complicity in the frauds could be satisfactorily established. The House committee has, however, been at work with much vigor; but as the revelations extended, and it became apparent that some of the most trusted leaders of the Republican party had been implicated in the discreditable transactions, the vigor and enthusiasm gradually vanished. They gave place to a decided determination to make as little as possible out of the matter and to screen the guilty parties.

The ignominious finale perpetrated by the WILSON Committee from the Senate and the general public indignation it created, are, yet, we presume, within the recollection of our readers. Equally miserable and discreditable has been the ending of the POLAND Committee. The report presented to the House was weak and faltering even to pusillanimity, so that there is no room for doubting it was prepared for the express purpose of affording the corruptionists and bribe-takers an opportunity of escaping punishment. As a matter of course, the resolutions adopted were utterly inadequate and failed to give the verdict which the citizens would pass upon the incriminated parties if they only had the chance. So it is finally settled that a majority of Congress think the prostitution of the power of legislation and the receipt of bribes by the nation's law-makers things of very little if any importance. Thus have they disgraced this Republic in the eyes of the civilized world and made it a by-word for political dishonor.

In such becomes the duty of the people to have no share in this outrage upon decency and justice. There is no necessity for revolution, or for any violent measures for retribution, riot or disturbance. Happily the Constitution provides a most effectual remedy for all these things. Every one of the individuals who have been concerned in the Credit Mobilier affair, either as an actual receiver of bribes or as a condoner of corruption in others, must at once be forever excluded from the position of a candidate for reelection to office or as an applicant for new honors, and he should receive such a reception as would teach him the unchangeable fact that the people have rather higher notions of morality than his fellow-Congressmen.

SYMPATHY WITH CRIMINALS.

One great cause of the many failures of justice which disgrace our Courts is undoubtedly the morbid sympathy with criminals exhibited by prominent and influential members of society. As soon as a ruffian is condemned to the gallows, after all his lawyer's ingenuity has been exercised in vain, steps are taken to get up a petition for commutation of sentence. Men who ought have common sense, and who ought to be supposed to be intelligent, sign it without the least hesitation. They do it the moral courage to say that the law must be vindicated and the slayer of his fellowman punished. When the petition is presented to the Governor he is put in an extremely invidious and uncomfortable position. He knows that the murderer deserves to be hung, and, in accordance with law, ought to be hung; but, then, he finds men personally known to himself and highly respected by the whole community, asking for the criminal's pardon, it is nearly hard for him to resist such appeals and say, "No, he must die," because it stakes him appear self as the mere executioner of the man. The pardoning power, instead of being an attribute of strength or a prerogative, is in truth an onerous and most disagreeable responsibility. It is, we are sure, the most unpleasant and least enviable duty imposed by the people by their highest State official. In New York we find no less a personage than Vice-President COLFAX interceding on behalf of FOSTER, the car-hook murderer. We all know the manner which were attached to the petition which saved DONOVAN's life from the gallows to infamy. This is not charity, or benevolence, or humanity, or any of the virtues which makes man dear to his fellowman. Considering the frequency of the crime of murder in this country, the most praiseworthy humanity would be that which would insure speedy and condign punishment to the evil-doer. Until our citizens are impressed with a proper sense of the heinousness of murder, and until they look upon him who wantonly sheds human blood as worse than a wild beast, the arm of justice will remain forcless and crime will be rampant.

THE SPANISH REPUBLIC.

Our predictions with respect to the fate of the Spanish Republic are fast being verified. The tendency of all our late telegraphic dispatches from Europe is to demonstrate the certainty of DON CARLOS possessing himself of the throne before the lapse of many months. The Government for the time being has, of course, complete control of the wires, and no news is transmitted that has not been subjected to official supervision. The republicans assuredly try to put the best face possible upon their prospects, and accordingly they represent the people as being quite satisfied with the revolution and charmed with the present condition of affairs. Just as in the time of ANADEUS, the Carlists are beaten, routed and annihilated every day—on paper; nevertheless, the fact creeps out now and then that they are making head in the country, and repulsing the Government troops in every encounter. The very latest news is to the effect that bands of Carlists have made their appearance in the neighborhood of Madrid, and that great numbers of respectable families are leaving the city, alarmed at the prospect of civil war. We should like very much to be favored in public, because the Catholic instincts and the law-abiding habits of the people are guarantees that they would not be led away by the false principles of Republicanism, and place at the head of affairs a set of infidels and blasphemers. Their hatred of the priesthood is so far as the masses of Ireland are concerned. Let the orator tell a little story about the priest, and the audience don't trouble themselves about reasons; there is no security for speculating on the part of the priest, and accumulating property secured by the bonds and stocks of the country have been hoodlined in search of employment. Old Shylock is now where he will not pounce upon "his pound of flesh." Since he has been in love with the Chinese—giving them employment as cooks, waiters, taking care of children, etc.—he has associated with former customers are missing, and no longer do they congregate around the dull blues and scarcity of coin. In short, your correspondent is observed to be for the counter, whining about dull times, at the absence of the "flush times" that have been in his employ, but who had to pay to make room for the Asiatic who "only wanted half a dollar," what is the cause of those horrible dull times?" "Dull times, my dear Jimmy," oh the D——l by a doctor."

Some twelve years ago not a single dwelling existed on the site of Stockton, but now the former seat of substantial brick dwellings and stores, while for other reasons not understood, Chinamen have stepped into it as soon, and now occupy them. The filthy and filthy odor of their surroundings is a nuisance which, if the white men are liable, I pronounce him not much of a man. The Chinese. We need not go to Stockton to see the nuisance. Some of the distilled heathens occupy the three or four houses on the Catholic church lot, and on Sunday the cloud of smoke, fumes and indecency generally, which arises from their dens, and which compels to church is certainly a second edition of Purgatory. We have mumbled about this matter before, and we will mumble it again, if carried on, as it is, in a manner which, if carried on, as it is, in a manner which, if carried on, as it is, in a manner which

THE OLD ADOBE HOUSE,

NEAR RANCHO SAN ANTONIO, EIGHTEEN MILES SOUTH OF SAN JOSE.

Dark and desolate, drear and still,
Under the shade of the nearest hill,
Years have passed since her builders trod
The fairest floors of the valley's sod;
Years have passed since in wild gala rang
To the merry strains by glad voices sung—
When genial pleasure and social mirth
Met in the glow of the lighted hearth,
And hospitality's open hand
Welcomed the wanderers from every land.
Now its stone of age on its walls to gray—
It has owned the touch of the hand to decay,
And, dark and desolate, drear and cold,
It is crumbling fast to the valley mold.

Yet, could the old walls find a tongue
To echo the strains that within them rang,
What tales it might tell of the poet's lay—
Of the warrior resting after the fray;
What tales of the dreams that at night would come
To the weary exiles from Scotia's home,
As of their wealth in the land of gold—
Its rocks and its mines of the yellow gold—
Far rest and shelter were never denied
When sought in that home by the lone Hillside.
Purchasers they! would breathe of the words of prayer!

That throbbed each eve through the balmy air,
When taught the saves earth way trod.
To bear them up to the Throne of God.

Or the old oak trees that above it lean,
Twining through them their leafy arms,
Might whisper in accents soft and low
Some sweet love tale of the long ago—
Some silvery echo, faint and far,
Heard here when the light of the evening star
Shone softly down on the tranquil scene,
On the silent vale and the forest green,
When earnest lover and blushing maid
Strayed 'neath the boughs in the moonlight shade.
The birds have a gold song and sing it beyond sight,
And Cupid rained win his rest of night—
And the bridal feast in that home been spread
Where rats now keeps her vigils dread.

Ah, rats rules in this moldering pile!
And owls have possession conferred by Mastery.
And yet El Toro in silence broods
A sacred awe over the ruin of ours—
A sacred awe that gives it worth,
Over broad plains wrapped in their cloth of gold,
Over forests where wild, weird harpings swell
When the breeze strikes the lyre of the Nereoni,
Where the flitting shadows dance and play
And the sad dove mourns thro' the Summer day;
And his chosen mate with trumpet blast
When the fire-fed comet with a neigh sweeps past
Or the Eagle screams from his mountain height
With an hour of thunder through the valley's heart.

Dark and desolate, drear and cold,
And crumbling fast to the valley mold,
The old home stands in its ruined grief;
But it has memories thou canst discover—
Memories that with a magic power
Thy fancy wakes hillside to flower;
Memories whose golden links are cast
To bind the years gone by to the past,
A chain by a gentler genius wrought
Of many a tender and kindly thought.
Of deeds whose blessings will with us stay
Though the generations down have passed away,
And deep where the tangled grasses wave
And the wild flowers droop o'er each silent grave.

THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART SECOND.

The citizens of Dublin were now less obstinate in refusing to give the imperial forces access to the Castle through their gates; and negotiations for that purpose were again opened. On the evening of the first day of the truce that succeeded, Sir John Talbot wrapped in his cloak, passed into the city, unobserved among the multitude that flocked from all quarters with provisions for the famished inhabitants, for the poorer classes had already suffered dreadfully from hunger. The streets were thronged with gaunt crowds, some laughing, some weeping—mothers and their children, their faces smeared with the raw oatmeal which they ravened up from the sack mouth, tottering upon the causeways; then the rebel soldiery, flushed with their success, and insolent in the confidence of triumph, shouting and singing in the streets, and the disheartened loyalists, on the Castle walls, replying with faint cheers at intervals, and every now and then with a sound of a solitary shot against the batteries begun in Preston's lines, fronting the batteries, together made a bewildering bubbub, like the noises in a dream.

Talbot reached the interior strong with hurrying steps and a beating heart. Each pale face that passed him seemed like a spectre glaring through the twilight; the confused noises that surrounded him fell on his ear like a general lamentation. When he reached Dudley's Court, doors and windows were barred, and all was silent as the grave. "Ah!" he exclaimed, "here is an altered household! my poor wife Ellen, this shock will have broken her heart! but thank God that I bear her some comfort; she will need it more now than ever; but, good Heaven, they cannot surely have left the house!" He knocked, but the echoes of the heavy knocker died away in the silence of the empty courtyard. His heart sank as he listened in vain for any indication or reply; his first idea was, that they had perhaps gone to Kilmainham; but this he rejected, unconscious as the reason, and walked with a quick, but unsteady step round to the garden door. He clambered over the wall; the flowers were trampled and tangled, and the place did not look like itself. "Ellen, dear Ellen, Dudley's window; there was no answer to his cry upon the pane. He called her name; there was no reply but the echo. The thought that all had perished of famine then like open his soul with the coldness of death he tore open the window and rushed in. The chamber was empty, the hall was dark and silent—thank God, his first fear was groundless; they were all gone; but he dared not call, he dared whisper—for the pressure of some undefined calamity, admitted nothing but suggestions of horror. He opened a door, and passed like a sleep-walker into the courtyard; then stepped upon the wharf. Here, at the end, a shank of a broken anchor, set an old serving-man gazing down the river.

"Friend! Where, in the name of God, are they gone?" cried he, and he laid his hand upon the man's shoulder, for he felt as if he would drop.

"Gone to Skinner Row for meat, and some to the bridge for a sheep," replied the sailor; "we are all discharged now, since the old master was slain at Saggoth."

"But his family—his daughter—where is she? She began to the house of some of her father's friends—has she not?"

"No, master, she has gone with the Archbishop."

"With the Archbishop! What right had the Archbishop to take her away? Is not Archbishop Allan with White in the Castle?"

"He left the Castle early this morning, master, for he feared he could not hold out against the rebels, now that they have got within the city walls; and when he came here and found the poor young lady almost heartbroken, with neither father nor mother, nor any friend to protect her, and the household broken up, and she without brother or sister—"

"Speak out, sir! Death and perdition! What has Allan dared to do with Master Dudley's daughter?"

"The Archbishop has taken young mistress Ellen with him; and right glad any friend of the house ought to be to know she is in such holy keeping. I hope in God's mercy they will be safe in Bristol before tomorrow night; why, sir, I have been watching them here, and praying them a good passage for the last hour and better." As he spoke he pointed down the river, where a bark was dimly visible in the twilight, beating out into the open bay.

"A boat, a boat!" cried Talbot, casting off his cloak; "we can overtake them yet! The wind is all against them! Traitor priest, you shall not rob me!—false priest, I will have her back again, or break thy crosier for it! Ten Rose nobles for a boat! Call Connor Kelly—where is the boatchief, dastard? Ah! I am raving! Friend, for the love of God, help me to get a boat; I will give ten pieces of gold to be put on board yonder ship."

"They are far beyond the reach of pursuit," replied the man; "no open boat could live in the sea that is now running on the bar. The Archbishop's bark, that is a stout vessel of a hundred tons, will have enough to do to clear the Hulls."

"Accursed! And she is to be carried off before my eyes! Hol sirrah, is the Archbishop's vessel armed?"

"Better manned and armed than any other that has left the port since the troubles began; you may make up your mind to let them go where they will the bout, master."

Talbot stood for a few moments with clenched hands and swelling heart, gazing blankly at the receding sail. At length he exclaimed, "Was there never no one with them, before the man had time to make an answer, a fresh access of rage against the Archbishop. "She never went with her will. Alan has forced her off by fraud; if he has, I will be avenged, if he were thrice a bishop—dog priest!" He shook his clenched hands furiously at the distant vessel. "I will meet them yet—I will; and if thou hast dared to profane my child with sacrilegious hands, the vengeance of a desperate man!—want she with her will! I say again, no!"

But the man had risen in horror and alarm and was closing the wicket of the courtyard behind him as Talbot turned to repeat the question. Uttering many so exclamation of furious purport, he paced up and down the deserted wharf, sometimes stopping and straining his eyes to catch a glimpse of the sail; then turning abruptly, as if he could not bear the sight of it; and then again smashing the grey distance to take another last look, blank and despairing; but the indistinct outline had melted ere long into the wide misty horizon, and he was left alone among the deep shades of evening, with the rising waves whistling desolately along the unmanned ramparts overhead, and sweeping up the bare expanse of the river into black and angry tumult at his feet. With a heart full of rage and sorrow he returned by the water's edge, and recrossed the bridge at the darkness of night set in.

The night fell black and stormy, and, as he rode back to Artane—for he had left his horse in charge of the wife—the winds raged about the woods as wildly as when he made that fatal visit for the last time to Miles Dudley. Bitter as his reflections had then been, still bitterer, beyond comparison of wretchedness, were they now. His fancy had taken a new turn, and now, instead of furnishing him with causes of anger against the archbishop, overwhelmed his heart with suggestions favoring the fact of Ellen Dudley's voluntary flight. Two days had elapsed since she was left without a protector, and, although the service in which he was serving those times reluctantly engaged had made communication or intercourse impossible, yet she, ignorant as she was of that impediment, might well consider herself neglected, and justly resent his seeming desertion at a time of such unmitigated impediment. Might not the taunts of the hands of his companions was enough to make a child so affectionate shrink for a while, under any circumstances, from her constancy to him; but what stung his soul with the severest pang was the thought, which he could not shake off for a moment, that she might have suspected him of lacking the old man to stain when it was in his power to have saved his life; nay, horrible as the idea was, even presenting his death, that he might no longer stand between him and the fulfillment of the promise she had made of marrying him at once if left without another guardian. He could not believe that the heart he loathed the thought; but he could not banish it from his mind, and his anguish almost rose to frenzy. He galloped madly forward through the darkness, reckless of his safety, cursed the hour of his birth, and hurling his breast to the storm that was now raging far and wide across the level country, till, at the moment when he was beyond the Tolka, where the deep roar of the sea-breeze on Clontarf met the wind in his ear. He pulled up, and half unconsciously turned his face to the sea. A pale light flashed through the gloom of the night, but all beyond was dark as midnight. "A wild night for your voyage, Ellen dear," he exclaimed; "they had best hasten that could force you on the sea such a night as this!" As he spoke a flash suddenly broke through the gloom in the offing. He held his breath and listened, while the tear trembling on his eyelid was dried up in the concentrated intensity of his gaze; he heard nothing but the hoarse roar and the groaning of the trees —could it have been the fire glancing from his own strained eyeballs?—no—there was another flash! and he now heard plainly over the mingling waves the report of a gun. "The archbishop is making signals of distress!" he exclaimed; "she is driving ashore—that God, thank God, I may save her!" Almost shrieking with the vehemence of a desperate man!—want she with her will! I say again, no!"

He pulled up, and half unconsciously turned his face to the sea. A pale light flashed through the gloom of the night, but all beyond was dark as midnight. "A wild night for your voyage, Ellen dear," he exclaimed; "they had best hasten that could force you on the sea such a night as this!" As he spoke a flash suddenly broke through the gloom in the offing. He held his breath and listened, while the tear trembling on his eyelid was dried up in the concentrated intensity of his gaze; he heard nothing but the hoarse roar and the groaning of the trees —could it have been the fire glancing from his own strained eyeballs?—no—there was another flash! and he now heard plainly over the mingling waves the report of a gun. "The archbishop is making signals of distress!" he exclaimed; "she is driving ashore—thank God, thank God, I may save her!" Almost shrieking with the vehemence of a desperate man!—want she with her will! I say again, no!"

LETTER FROM EUREKA, NEVADA.

EUREKA, LANDER COUNTY, NEVADA,
February 28, 1873.

To the Editor of The Monitor—SIR: At the solicitation of my fellow-miners of the Eureka district I send you the following items for publication. Four months ago this was a prosperous mining community, our furnaces all running full blast, the mines working to their fullest capacity; the hills resounded with the woodman's ax, and on all sides were to be seen evidences of prosperity, which some deemed permanent. While I write all this is changed; the furnaces, with one solitary exception, are all shut down; the mines are in a like condition, except the K. K.; the miners are thronging away to fresh fields of enterprise, and there is hardly a sound to disturb the silence that broods over the land. You will naturally ask the cause of the sudden change. The causes are various. The likelihood, one of our leading mines, is shut down in consequence of their lawsuit with the Look Out; the Ruby Consolidated and other mines have capped work because of their inability to have their ores hauled on account of the horse disease; and several prospectors have ceased to work their claims owing to the severity of the weather. As regards the Eureka Consolidated,

THE BIG MINE OF THE DISTRICT,

Everything is at a standstill, but inactivity is incomprehensible. It cannot be in consequence of their dispute with the Richmond, for they need not be expected to take ore from the disputed ground; the furnaces are in good order and have a supply on hand to last for months. It is a well-known fact among the miners that there is a abundance of ore in the mine, and the roads are as passable for them as for the J. K. Company.

In the meantime, Mr. A. M. Ellsworth, the present acting Superintendent, is busily engaged in pay-upsidding new buildings—to-day making the most faithful promises; to-morrow, basely violating them. In this camp, from the beginning, it has been customary with the miners to quit work at five o'clock on Saturday evening, thereby working nine instead of ten hours on that day. As the town of Eureka is distant more than two miles from the mines, and work was continued on Sundays, the concession in favor of the management was considered small by the mine-owners, and was never grudged or disputed until the arrival of Mr. Ellsworth among us. As soon as he was assailed to the position of Superintendent he determined to have the concession abolished. In consequence of this determination on his part,

THE MINES STRUCK,

And work was abandoned for four entire days. A Committee was then appointed to wait on him and hear what he had to say on the subject. Mr. Ellsworth stated that for the previous month the expenses of the mine had been in excess of the returns, which fact obliged him to use the strictest economy in every particular. To this the miners made no objection, but were unanimous to one and to others on the Committee, that economy should be put in force by violating the established customs of the district, in the face of the fact that he had stated to be supported by the men, after a direct at the furnace several hundred tons of stand. Hitherto the rule would only assay one dollar to the ton in silver. This was not done from ignorance; the rush was then in first-class ores, and it would be to be of more importances to the Superintendent that Mr. Davis' teams should be kept hauling than that the character of the ore hauled should be considered. Besides considering the cost of extracting, transporting and refining such large quantity of low-grade ore—almost tantamount to—it is not to be wondered at that the outlay should outbalance the profits. The result of the conference was that the

MINERS WENT TO WORK AGAIN,

With the express condition that the old regime should be inviolate. After the lapse of a few weeks all were discharged who took part in the strike, and their places filled up by green hands—men who had never been underground before in their lives, but were willing to go to work in the mines even on degrading terms when they could not find employment at their own avocations. The other superintendents do not take shame in the movement of Mr. Ellsworth, nor indorse it with their sympathy. At present everything is quiet, but it is feared that his meddling propensities will lead to trouble in the future; and, indeed, such appears to be the conviction of Mr. Ellsworth himself, for he does not venture out even through the mine without an armed escort.

A Revolt in Algeria.

PARIS, March 3.—The Government is in receipt of dispatches from the French Governor of Algeria to the effect that a revolt has again broken out in that Province against French rule, and a determined and probably successful effort is about to be made to overthrow it. Upwards of 10,000 Algerians are fully armed and disciplined, and have surrounded a body of French troops seven hundred strong, under the command of Duke de Chartres; and attack by the rebels is probable at any moment. The French troops are determined to make the best possible defense, but, in view of the overwhelming numbers of the Algerians, a bloody struggle between the latter should they be attacked. News of the artificial situation of Duke de Chartres' command causes much excitement in Government here, and a sufficient force will in all probability be ordered to his relief at once. The Kabyles are leading the revolt. Among most prominent are those who, through the influence of the Government, received pardonment for their participation in the riding last year.

Our Minister to Japan created a flutter at the inauguration ball in Washington, Tuesday night, by appearing a little tardily in the full dress of her country." Imagine the consternation that would be created in this city by a gentleman making his appearance at a fashionable party with one of the high-combed daguerreos of the Flowery Kingdom leaning on his arm!—Post.

News was received in this city on Tuesday of this week that the British ship Siam had foundered when off Cape Horn. She sailed from Portland, Oregon, on the 17th of November last for Liverpool, having a cargo of wheat, aggregating 20,385 centals, valued at $21,648. No date is mentioned of the disaster.

BENEDICT FLAVORING EXTRACTS.—The superiority of these extracts consists in their perfect purity and great strength. They are warranted free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They have not acquired their reputation and sale by reason of their cheapness, and are no higher recommend that a comparatively small quantity only need be used. Joseph Benedict & Co., Boston, manufacturers and proprietors. For sale by all grocers and druggists.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

EL DORADO COUNTY.

A correspondent of the Union, writing from El Dorado, February 28, says: On Thursday last, at the mouth of Long Hollow, El Dorado county, Wash Mellinger and John Snyder took out of their claim a beautiful nugget of pure gold, worth $95; also, about $30 worth of other specimens. Pocahontas Quartz Mining Company have again struck it rich in their 500 foot level. Vaughn & Buttingham have found a splendid claim in sight of Old Mud Springs, from which they realize about $5 per day to the hand. Shaw & Thompson, having purchased the Nick Miller claim, near Davidson's Mill, are realizing about $150 per week, and on every side of Old Mud Springs the late copious rains have enabled the miners to make good finds.

On Wednesday last, Messrs. Shepherd & Whitton struck a rich body of pay ore in a shaft they lately commenced sinking on their ledge just back of the Episcopal church, hardly more than one hundred yards from this office. These gentlemen had prospected this ledge with favorable results at a point on Spring Ravine, near the old gas works; but at that point they were troubled by the water, and therefore changed their line of operations to the high grounds where they are now at work.

A correspondent furnishes the following: On Monday last, having an invitation from Mr. Burke to visit the Pocahontas mines, at Leggtown, I took advantage thereof, and was well repaid by the sight of more gold than "enabled the sailor" ever dreamed of. I was down in the mine to the 500-foot level where the main body of ore is literally packed with gold. I was astonished with the dazzling sight. The chamber is about one hundred feet long from front to bottom in the shaft, and penetrates the rich seam about thirty feet. This ledge is about three feet thick, of unknown depth, with thousands of tons of rock overlieud, which it is fair to suppose is as rich as that in sight. It is enough gold in sight to make a dozen men rich.

CALAVERAS.

The following items are from the Chronicle of March 1: Work upon Angels Camp company's ditch is now thoroughly repaired, and any danger from future slides guarded against. There is water in abundance, and all the mining companies are busily at work, paying no regard to the inclement weather. The great fall of snow in the mountains—protected as it is and has been for months past—gives a solid water-supply assurance that there will be no lack of water during the approaching season.

Garland's unit at Mosquito Gulch will shortly commence crushing rock from Albridge & Bechtel's mine.

The yield of the Gwin mine continues to be great, and there is no interruption of operations. When the next sinking is completed the mine will be opened to the depth of 700 feet.

The superintendent of the Good Hope is raising in the tunnel for the purpose of striking the main crosscut below the level of the tunnel. The low grade ores crushed recently added to the confidence in the mine.

KLAMATH.

The following is from the correspondence of the Yreka Journal: Times at Sawyer's Bar are very lively at present. The Black Bear Mining Company is busy taking out rock. Their ditch is now completely employed, hauling four tons each load, and three loads each day, making thirty-six tons per day in all. The mill is now running to its fullest capacity, 28 stamps. The rock pay $25 per ton.

NEVADA.

The Nevada Transcript of the 1st of March tells the following story: At Red Hill recently a ranch owner was walking by a piece of ground where the top dirt had been washed off to the depth of about five feet, and saw something shining. He went to the spot, and ascertaining it was gold, took out a piece weighing about three ounces. Informing the partner of the discovery, they stupified themselves with toil, and returned to the spot where the three-ounce specimen was found, and proceeded to clear away, for a distance of two and a half feet. It ledged still more for five feet in width, which was as far as the gold could be traced. The gold lay nearly flat the whole of this distance and on the bedrock. If it had been melted and poured out it could not have been more nearly laid as it was there. Some portions of it were as thin as a water glass, and of it there must be a twenty dollar gold piece. Our informant says if it had been taken out as he saw it would have been the most beautiful specimen ever exhibited in the world. The owners on seeing the sight became excited, and anxious to secure the remainder of their discovery, commenced picking it out every way they could, and in their excitement the specimen was seemed to indicate, at first sight, that it was a massive bowlder of gold, and on the surface it looked as though there was a block of gold worth millions of dollars. The find is out in two or three directions, and the total value of the gold was $3,000.

Mr. Hutchins's hydraulic claims on the Red Dog road, a short distance from town, are now in shape to work, and are

The causes are various. EL DORADO COUNTY.

A correspondent of the Union, writing from El Dorado, February 28, says: On Thursday last, at the mouth of Long Hollow, El Dorado county, Wash Mulligan and John Snyder took out of their claim a beautiful nugget of pure gold, worth $55; also, about $20 worth of other specimens. The Pocahontas Quartz Mining Company have again struck it rich in their 500 foot level. Vaughn & Buttingham have found a spicy 3½ claim in spite of old Man Springs, from which they realize about $5 per day to the hand. Shaw & Thompson, having purchased the Nek Miller claims, near Baldwin's Mill, are realizing about $100 per week, and in every side of old Man Springs the late copious rains have enabled the miners to make good flush.

A correspondent furnishes the following on Monday last, having an invitation from Mr. Burke to visit the Lebanon mine, at Leggtown, I took advantage thereof, and was well repaid by the sight of more gold than ever "smiled the sailor" ever dreamed of. I was down in the mine to the 500-foot level where the assay office is liberally packed with gold. I was astonished with the dazzling sight. There is water in abundance, and all the mining companies are busily at work, paying no regard to the inclement weather. The great fall of snow in the mountains—protected as it is and has been by a heavy cold weather—is sufficient assurance that there will be no lack of water during the approaching season.

Gallant Hill at Mokelumne Gulch will shortly commence crushing rock from Allbridge & Richardson's mine.

The yield of the Gwin mine continues to be great, and there is no interruption of operations. When the crushing is completed the mine will be opened to the depth of 700 feet.

Mormon's hydraulic claims on the Red Dog road, a short distance from town, are now at work, and by the exception of water. Their tunnel of 500 feet is completed through bedrock and lose there, a substantial flume has been built and the blocks are now being laid in the sluices.

PLACER.

The Herald of March 1st gives the following: "The St. Patrick's Company have put their whole working force on the Placer Hill, about half a mile from their mill, which they bought a few weeks ago of Judge Spear, paying for it over $10,000. The mine consists of three parallel ledges running nearly east and west, but diverging to the northeast at the eastern end, where there is an old shaft, sixty-five feet deep, from which the richest rock was taken in the former working. Mr. Crossman, the Superintendent is now working a shaft near the west end of the north ledge, down to about 165 feet and is taking out rock that averages about $40 per ton.

CALIFORNIA.

The San Diego Union of February 23d says that C. F. Robinson, Superintendent of the San Rafael Copper and Silver Mining Company, Lower California, has returned to that place from this San Diego's mining. Mr. Robinson brings with him some exceedingly rich ore, having an assay value of $485 per ton in silver and containing eighty-five per cent. copper. The ledge, which is situated about twenty-two miles from San Rafael, and within five miles of Ensenada, on the coast, is about one and a half feet wide on the surface, and has been traced for a distance of one and a half miles. A shaft has been sunk upon the ledge to a depth of one hundred and fifteen feet. For some distance down the ledge maintains a uniform width of five inches in width. It then gradually widens, and at the present depth of the shaft it is found to be eight and a half feet wide. A drift some twenty feet or so in length has been run along the ledge, and the body of ore continues as extensive and equally as rich as in any other part of the ledge. From eighteen to twenty tons of the ore has already been excavated and is ready for shipment.

Insurrection in the Ukraine.

A dispatch from St. Petersburg says the revolt in the Province of Ukraine has assumed alarming proportions, and the atrocities committed by the insubordinate peasantry are of the most revolting character. The insurgents have massed together in large numbers, and are extending their depredations throughout the district, leaving waste some of the principal towns. In several places the most barbarous excesses have been committed by the insurgents without provocation, attacking the inhabitants, burning their dwellings and murdering the inmates, in their fury not sparing either male or female. The power of the Government is defied, and the revolt is maintaining supreme control over the districts. A force of Russian troops from the city of Khiva, which had been dispatched to suppress the insurrection, were met by the insurgents, and the engagement terminated in the disastrous defeat of the Government troops. The inability of the Government to maintain order has created a general alarm, and the inhabitants are fleeing from the country.

A Disease with a Thousand Symptoms:

Dyspepsia is the most perplexing of all human ailments. Its symptoms are almost infinite in their variety, and the patients and dependent victims of the disease often fancy themselves the prey to nearly every known malady. This is due, in part, to the close sympathy which exists between the stomach and the brain, and, in the last analysis, to the fact that all disturbances of the digestive function necessarily disorder that liver, the lungs and the nervous system, and affects, in some extent, the quality of the blood. A medicine that, like Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, controls the stomach, but at the same time controls the liver, the bowels, the blood and the nerves, fulfills the double and—which is no small benefit—it does not stop with merely curing the disease, but thoroughly eradicates it. Such is the operation of this famous vegetable preparation, which is daily commended, not alone by all communities and transgressions, but by the faculty, who frequently prescribe it in their practice. No one is deceived in regard to the quality of this agreeable as positive and stimulating tonic. The debility and languor superinduced by the weather are overcome by its beneficial influence of this wholesome medicinal stimulant.

FATHER TOM'S FAREWELL.

He Declares Himself a Republican.

On the eve of the departure of the Rev. Father Burke and Lilly for Rome, in obedience to a sudden call from the Dominican Order, a number of the parishioners connected with the Church of St. Vincent Ferrer, assembled at the evening of February 24, at the residence of Alderman McCafferty, No. 838 Lexington avenue, New York, to pay their respects to the reverend gentlemen. It was an impromptu affair, but was entered into with the utmost feeling by a large party of gentlemen, and was an occasion of the most pleasing character. After the delivery of an address, accompanied by an appropriate donation of a clock for $750 to the kind Father Lilly, Prior of the Convent in New York, supper was announced, which called forth, in response to a toast, one of the most eloquent and characteristic addresses that Father Burke has ever delivered in this country.

Father Burke's Address.

I beg to thank the host, gentlemen, for having proposed my humble name, and I beg to thank you, gentlemen, for the kindness in which you have received it. You host, in proposing my name, illustrated the old adage, that "Hirvity is the soul of wit," and you all allow me to follow so noble an example and be brief in my remarks. It sometimes is a misfortune to priest. I hope, gentlemen, that to the end I may continue zealous as a priest, having a mind turning with the times, as much as I can less and to save the souls of my fellow-men. I am proud of my country, a true citizen of the land—the man to be sanctified and prized to be zealous for his sanctification. I am not ashamed to be called an Irishman. By all Almighty God will be faithful to my side; as far as I can be concerned I hope He will prove himself a consistent friend to the end of my soul. He toasted me as "the Irish Friar." Well, I am a friar, thanks be to God, and would not like to be anything else. Henry was not such a friar, a Dominican friar, an Irish friar, one of the Redmond Orders, one of those called in the middle ages "the begging friars" for I myself am a beggar for my brethren. This is what I am by the word Republican. When I profess myself to be a consistent Republican I mean a man who shows himself worthy of freedom, by acknowledging the supremacy of the law; who shows himself worthy by education and by training to be a legislator, by bowing down before the throne of justice; who shows himself worthy of making laws for his fellow-men by the tender regard he has for every right his fellow-man, within the bounds of conscience and virtue; a man who shows himself worthy to deal with his fellowmen, by fine proving, through his faith, his purity and his holiness of life that he has been found worthy to deal with the God who made him. That is a consistent Republican, in my sense of the word. As such I know myself a Republican. That is the Republicanism which will save America from all the evils that threaten any part of it. For what nation dares to raise its hand against the mighty Republic?

But, gentlemen, what are the dangers that threaten you from within? They are the dangers of want of conscience; they are the dangers of want of principle; they are the dangers of making public interest subservient to self-interest; they are the dangers of stifling public virtue; they are the dangers of losing faith in the consciousness of our own greatness losing faith in the greatness of God, who made us. From all those dangers the true Republican will be saved, because

THE TRUE REPUBLICAN

Means a man who does not presume to govern himself or his fellow-man until he first turns over his conscience by Divine Faith and by the ordinances of God to the Government of the Almighty God. He also toasted me as a patriotic Irishman. Well, as Irishman is not worth his salt unless he is a patriotic Irishman. The Irishman who does not love his land and is not a true patriot, means an Irishman so brutalized in every sense, so sinful in every faculty of his mind, so degenerated from all the traditions of his race as to be able to close his eyes wilfully and deliberately to all the arguments which to me, eye in every land, appeal to excite in his soul the highest love and the most stirring pride in the glory of the land and the race that bore him. No Irishman can be unpatriotic or cold until he learns to despise all that a true man ought to love—antiquity of race, purity of blood, splendor of history, adherence to principle, and fidelity to a High God in whom he has to live for ever. Without the earth strength and fortitude in defending the right, esteem and respect for the rights of every other people, unashamed bravery on the field of battle—Hoc nevere tibi, thanks be to God, ever brought that blush to Mother Erin's face or made her ashamed of the worst of her children. These things belong to us. We are not powerless and ignorant people. We are not powerless and ignorant people in proper language. The Irishman can be unpatriotic or cold until he learns to despise all that a true man ought to love—antiquity of race, purity of blood, splendor of history, adherence to principle, and fidelity to a High God in whom he has to live for ever. Without the earth strength and fortitude in defending the right, esteem and respect for the rights of every other people, unashamed bravery on the field of battle—Hoc nevere tibi, thanks be to God, ever brought that blush to Mother Erin's face or made her ashamed of the worst of her children. ### The Galway Persecutions.

The Galway persecutions commenced on Monday last with the trial of Father Loftus in the Court of Queen's Bench. The judge was the Chief Justice, and the counsel for the prosecution included not only Mr. Ralles, but Jr. Ball, the late Tory Attorney-General, and Sergeant Armstrong, who, it will be remembered, was Major Trench's well-paid leading advocate at the petition trial in Galway. Messrs. Butt, Maclermott and Carton appeared for Father Loftus. After a jury, which is said to have been composed of seven Catholics, three Protestants and two Quakers, had been empanneled, Mr. Palles stated the case against the reverend traverser. The evidence given in Galway was repeated. Mr. Butt delivered a splendid speech for the defence, and examined two witnesses. Mr. Macdermott and Sergeant Armstrong summed up for the traverser and Crown respectively, the Chief Justice charged, and at about ten o'clock on Wednesday night what was virtually a verdict of acquittal was rendered. Eleven of the jury were, it is understood, for an acquittal, one only for a conviction; but, of course, not being able to agree, the jury were discharged without any formal verdict being returned.

The result of the trial was received with unbounded joy by the very large crowd which had assembled in the Hall of the Four Courts. The Rev. Mr. Loftus and Mr. Butt were made the subjects of a regular ovation, and cheers were heartily given for others who had by any way or another espoused the cause of the Galway priests. Nor were grants unmingled with the expressions of joyous satisfaction. Mr. Palles and Justice Keogh, among others, were loudly and heavily denounced.—Nation, February 15.

Police Rule in Dublin.

The practice indulged in now and then by the police of unnecessary bludgeoning, tripping and kicking people, found a notable illustration in a case tried on Saturday in the Commission Court. Laurence Murphy, a respectable man, was charged with having assaulted two members of the force—a sergeant and a constable—and the evidence of these individuals went to show that he attempted to kick one of them, and telling him to keep himself quiet; that fact said Cork—if I may being sentenced to be wound up by January, 1876—the Catholic University of Magee College. About one-fourth of the present revenues of Trinity College, which already contributes about half a million sterling to the support of the Established Church, are to be handed over to the new University, and with this and some of the surplus arising from the Disestablished Church, ten university fellowships of £200 a year, tenable for five years; 50 university scholarships of £50 a year, tenable for four years, and 100 Exhibitions of £25 a year are to be founded. These prizes may be competed for by members of any of the colleges in the United Kingdom, and the successful candidates will take them with them to their own colleges. The new University is not to teach theology, but is to have professorships of history and philosophy; and though it will examine in philosophy and modern history, no students need take up these subjects for his degree unless he chooses to do so. The new University is to be governed by a Senate, to have a Chancellor, an "ornamental officer," who will be Lord-Lieutenant, and a Vice-Chancellor, elected by the governing body; this is to consist of twenty-eight ordinary members, who are to form the principal portion of the council, and are to be selected for the first time by the Government without distinction of creed; and the Senate of the Queen's University is to be absorbed into the Senate of the Dublin University. These are the principal features of the measure. Catholics gain the chance of obtaining University degrees and University emoluments after studying in their own institution, and degrees are also thrown open to those who can show that they have attended University classes in the Catholic University a sufficient time during the last ten years. The colleges are to be entirely free from all theological organization and discipline, but to avail themselves or not of the University lectures as they please, when the new plan is to be founded; instruction on the subjects already specified being altogether excluded from the University curriculum and established in that of the Colleges.—London Tablet.

A Fine Old English Custom.

However disordered Mr. Gladstone may be in her new and interesting occupation of asserting her rights, it is satisfactory to note that her affections have undergone no yet no material change. Women will occasionally appear averse to marriage, and their motherly love is at times as touching as ever. A singular instance of this tenderness of woman for her offspring was afforded by a case, which came before the magistrates at the county police court, Hufdersfield, a few days ago. Elizabeth Hackling, who described herself as sempstress of Bedford Rees, was charged with having attempted to murder and poison her child, sixteen months old, whereby his life was endangered. Mrs. Hackling pleaded guilty to the charge, and in her own unfounded accusation was never brought against a respectable woman. It is true that she parted with her child, but she did not throw it into a ditch or leave it by the roadside, as some women might have done; she merely found the infant a comfortable home, which it lost doubtless thought its own an intolerable. The circumstances were as follows: Being in a public-house, she heard a carter named Rainforth declare that he had three children for whom he would not take £2,000. Evidently struck by Rainforth's strong surety of feeling, Mrs. Hackling thought she could not place her own little one in better hands, and after a little conversation, during which she "had a bad" say, reasonably bad." And this is what he proposes as the remedy. The University of Dublin, hitherto practically a synonym for Trinity College, is to be denied from that institution, enlarged and organized; and in it are to be incorporated Trinity College, two Queen's Colleges, Belfast and Cork—if they have not succeeded to be wound up by January, 1876—the Catholic University and

AN UNSEEMLY WRANGLE.

About a fortnight ago Judge JAMES HAYDEN died in this city at an advanced age. He had been, it seems, a member of the Masonic body, and was connected with CROCKETT Lodge, No. 139, although intimate friends who knew the Catholic sympathies of the old man never imagined he had affiliated himself to the fraternity. During his last illness he was attended by the Rev. Father BUCHARD, S. J., and the Rev. Father PHILLIPS, who heard his confession and administered to him the last Sacraments. He died, therefore, in full communion with the Church, and was entitled to the honors which are bestowed upon the remains of the faithful departed.

According to the statements of his immediate personal friends, and according to the acknowledgment of the gentleman in whose house he died—viz: Mr. [illegible], a Catholic—he expressed a desire to be buried with the rites of the creed which he had always professed during life. The Masons took possession of his body—promising that the rites of the R. C. deceased should be complied with—and yet prepared to inter it after their peculiar semi-pagan fashion. Learning this, several of the late Judge's friends, some of whom were not Catholics, and at least two of whom were themselves Masons, went to Corinthian Hall, on Post street, whence it was announced to be buried, and demanded the body, in order that it might be deposited in the Catholic cemetery and with the rites of the Catholic Church. None of these persons, we venture to say, were actuated by any desire to champion the Catholic Church, as opposed to the Masonic society, but rather were moved to fulfill the wishes of their departed friend. Most certain it is, at any rate, that they were not consulted as to their proceedings by any of the ecclesiastical authorities in the city.

We need hardly say that their request was peremptorily refused. The Master of the Lodge, Mr. MCCONNICK, would not deliver up the body, and declared, moreover, that buried with Masonic rites it should be at all hazards. So, on last Monday week the mortal remains of Judge HAYDEN were accompanied to the Masonic cemetery by numerous and imposing cortège, and were deposited in the earth after the due performance of the usual meaningless and ridiculous mummeries. But somehow a report got abroad that "the Catholics," that is, the personal friends of the deceased, were determined to have their way, and would dig up the body to have it placed in consecrated ground. This came to the ears of the Masonic sexton, and for two days he had the grave watched by men armed with revolvers and shotguns, who were paid the modest sum of ten dollars per diem for their services. But this was rather expensive and could not be carried on indefinitely, so he hit upon a ruse. He "resurrected" the corpse and buried it secretly elsewhere.

No doubt he and his brother Masons are chuckling over this dexterous maneuver, and flatter themselves that they have nicely circumvented "the Catholics." They have done no such thing, but have taken a great deal of trouble about nothing at all. The Catholics, that is, the Catholic Church acting through its legitimate authorities, will not enter upon any unseemly wrangle to obtain them and the possession of a dead body. Judge HAYDEN received the sacraments before he died, abjured the Masonic fraternity, and, of course, expressed his heartfelt sorrow for having ever joined it. The proof of this is to be found in the fact that the reverend gentlemen who attended him during his fatal illness, as well as his nearest and dearest friends, possessed and have Catholic silver, bear testimony to it. That is all "the Catholics" care about. When a man has made his peace with Almighty God, and has reconciled himself with Holy Church, it matters very little indeed where his ashes are laid or with what ceremonies they are commingled with the parent earth. The men who bear them to their final resting place may perform whatever antics best please them; they may imitate the funeral ceremonies of paganism if they like; but all this will make no difference to the poor, frail being who has gone before his Eternal Judge.

So far as the facts of this case are concerned we have done little more than transcribe them from the Chronicle, and we have few, if any, comments to make. If we were inclined to make some we should content ourselves with borrowing the truthful words of Mr. MCCONNICK, Master of CROCKETT Lodge, to the effect that it is useless for men to try to carry water on both shoulders, and that they must take their choice between Masonry and Catholicity. If they think they will do better in this world and the next by embracing Masonry and rejecting Catholicity, they can do so, taking, of course, all the responsibilities. But it is the very height of absurdity to imagine that one can be a Mason and a Catholic at the same time. It is the object of Masonry to serve as a religion and supersede all forms of Christianity. Hence its inveterate antagonism to the Catholic Church, which is the only creed with courage and consistency enough to oppose it.

THE "ALTA'S" HONESTY.

A STAW will show how the wind blows. The heading given to a telegraphic item showed the animus that the Alta has towards Catholicity. Our readers must have already learned from our columns that the GLADSTONE Ministry recently proposed to make very sweeping changes in the Constitution of Trinity College, with the hope of settling the "Education Question," so far as Ireland is concerned. The Irish hierarchy and the Irish people want to get a charter and annual subsidy for the Catholic University, which they have been supporting at great expense for more than twenty years. The Government is unwilling to grant this concession, but proposes to secularize Trinity and to make its professors merely a body of examiners. Then, they say, students could study wherever they pleased, either at home under private tutors, in a Catholic, Episcopalian or Presbyterian institution, and present themselves for examination before the Trinity professors as soon as they thought they had attained sufficient proficiency. The degrees or distinctions awarded to them, if they came up to the required standard of merit, would have Government recognition and bear the stamp of the Dublin University. This plan may be very ingenious, but unfortunately it is not satisfactory to any party, except a miserable and insignificant clique of nobelievers, who are eager to support any educational scheme which promises to work to the detriment of religion. The Episcopalians are in arms against it; the Presbyterians loudly denounce it; and, as might be supposed, the Catholics are strongly opposed to it. A few days ago the Irish Bishops petitioned the Government against this Educational bill, and expressed a hope that it would not pass through the House of Commons. When this fact was telegraphed hither, the Alta, with its usual honesty and intelligence, announced it to the public as "Catholic opposition to education." We ask our readers could anything be more unfair than such conduct? The matter may in itself be comparatively trivial, but it derives importance from the circumstance that it serves to illustrate the amount of fair dealing which our co-religionists at home and abroad may expect to get from the Alta. If our contemporary was not in such a hurry to misrepresent the actions of the Irish Bishops and put an invidious interpretation upon them, it would probably refect a little, and try to make out whether, to petitioning against the abolishment of Trinity College, the prelates were "opposing" education or endeavoring to protect it.

THE CONDITION OF BERLIN.

The inhabitants of Berlin, the gay Capital of Prussia, do not appear to have gained much by the military glories which have recently fallen to the lot of their country. They do not appear to have been rendered happier, or greater or better thereby. And the five milliards of francs which have been exacted from conquered France, instead of being used to improve their financial condition, is being lavished on a huge army, on the chief duty of which is to repress their aspirations after liberty. Some weeks ago a certain Herr HINZE read before a scientific meeting a paper on the moral and social condition of Berlin, the facts of which were derived from Herr SCHWABE, President of the Statistical Bureau. They are thus taken from high official sources, and have the stamp of Government authority. We ask this to be borne in mind, because the tale they tell could not be excelled in horror by anything that the worst enemies of the German people could invent for the purpose of calumny. The city, we are assured, contains about eight hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, and of them no less than one hundred and twenty-five thousand are so poverty-stricken as to require public relief. This is the same as saying that one Berliner out of every seven is little better than a pauper! Twenty per cent. of the population is huddled together in overcrowded rooms, where disease of all kinds makes dreadful ravages. The forests in the environs are infested with robbers, with whom even the police are unable to cope. Of course, we are told, they receive no sympathy or assistance from the presumably respectable classes. Life and property are unsafe in the public streets. Of course the moral status of such people must be deplorably low, so it must not surprise us to learn that the artisans and workingmen have an unconquerable aversion to matrimony, and that one-seventh of the births in Berlin are illegitimate. Twenty-three thousand burials took place in 1870, and of these fully twenty thousand were unmarked by any sort of religious ceremony. Official statements likewise, compiled with equally authoritative assertions that the churches are almost deserted, that the theaters are infamously conducted, that dissipation and sensuality have become the most notable characteristics of the lower orders, give us an impression of German life and manners which is not by any means a pleasing one. Yet this is the nation which is now looked upon as a model, and to copy which seems to be the ambition of many American politicians. This is the picture presented by the country of compulsory education, of progressive and liberal principles, of antagonism to the claims of "ecclesiasticism." We were told, a London contemporary remarks, that "the superior moral character" of the Germans gave them their great victories over the French; but if all the Germans are like the people of Berlin, we should rather attribute Sadowa, Sedan and Metz to French blundering and inefficiency.

ROGUERY AT A PREMIUM.

After the innumerable denunciations of Congressional corruption to which the newspapers of all parties have treated the public during the last five or six months, the evil-doers appear to be just as well off as ever. Not one of them has been published or suffered the least injury in person or property. The "investigations" which brought forth such very piquant revelations were utterly destitute of practical result, and their failure is a matter of notoriety. This may be in great measure attributable to the fact that few if any of these gentlemen who sat in judgment upon the alleged bribe-receivers and corruptionists could do so with undisturbed conscience. If all the Senators and Congressmen who bought their places or sold their influence were to be impeached at one time, there would, we feel certain, be great difficulty experienced in procuring an untainted jury of their peers to try them. As none of the offenders have been expelled or even strongly censured, we are told, as a solace, that their "reputation" has been blasted by the disclosures made and that their characters are irretrievably ruined. This may be true, but it is to be argued therefrom that they have suffered in mind or purse upon that account, we beg leave to dissent. These gentlemen can get on nicely without any reputation at all, and the loss of their characters will never seriously trouble them. It will not take a dime out of their pockets, and what is worse, it will not lessen their influence or interfere with their future prospects. The people are quite willing to condone their offenses, and to give them an opportunity of repeating them whenever they like. The constituencies would expect the sacred purposes to which it is devoted, but if Grece the Archbishop met long since considered it advisable to authorize the creation of a new parish, and the result is the erection of a handsome church, which will seat about 1,000 persons. The corner-stone was laid on Sunday by the Archbishop, assisted by a number of the clergy. The edifice, which is to be completed in about six months, will cost $40,000.

ENGLAND AND PORTUGAL.

The Spanish revolution is causing much excitement in Portugal. Fears are entertained that the Republicans will revolt, attempt to effect a union with their Spanish brethren, and declare the House of Braganza. The telegraph announces to us that if such a contingency take place, England will interfere and sustain the monarchy with her fleet and army. It is highly probable that this announcement is correct in all essentials. For long years Portugal has been the mere creature of England, preserving only a shadow of national independence. A strong British fleet winters in the Tagus, and the British Premier for the time being exercises more power in Lisbon than he does to London. While Lord PALMERSTON was on the throne England did her utmost to promote the Iberian settlement, which demanded a union of the whole peninsula under one Government, but in those days it was Portugal that was to swallow up Spain, not Spain Portugal, as at present; and, of course, the British were hugely in favor of that programme, as it would extend the influence which Lord PALMERSTON was extremely anxious for a war between Spain and Portugal, and intrigued hard to bring it about, intending that England should interfere on behalf of the latter power and annex Portugal to her dominions. But, unfortunately for his calculations, it leaked out that France would take sides with Spain, and the probabilities being that the latter coalition would prove the successful one, PALMERSTON quickly abandoned his project. From that time until the present there has been very little talk about Iberianism. Nor do we think it has been revived, with but the slight alteration of Spain being the annexing power, England will not tolerate it; but, on the contrary, will burn powder to prevent its realization, more especially as France is in no position to share in the quarrel. But England will not be called upon to send any army to the peninsula. The Spanish Republic is already degenerating into Socialism, and Don CARLOS will put an end to that before the lapse of many months. He has no designs against the independence of Portugal, and will be content with reigning over the Spanish part of the Iberian peninsula, a spectable and order-loving people throughout Europe that his triumph may be speedy and complete. We are very much afraid that the day for republicanism in the Old World is yet far distant, and we have not the least wish for its approach until the populations know what republicanism really is and wherein lies the difference between liberty and license.

LETTER FROM SAN JOSE.

SAN JOSE, March 13, 1873.

To the Editor of The Monitor — Barring Oakland, I know of no town in all the State that is thriving so finely as beautiful San José. Since I was last here, in '68, I observe many and

GREAT IMPROVEMENTS,

Especially in the matter of fine public and private buildings; while the city is still expanding in almost every direction, and what were fields only a few years since are now streets, thickly lined with houses and supplied with gas and water. Among the most noticeable of the new and elegant structures is the banking-house of McLaughlin & Ryland, which would be an ornament to your own California street in its select part.

A NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH

Has been put up since I was last here; not in place of, but adjoining the old one of St. Joseph. It is of wood and very commodious, and is designed every Sunday by the faithful from this and the surrounding country. The old edifice of brick is used for school purposes, under the auspices of the Society of Jesus. No doubt, indeed, is the growth of the Catholic population, that his Grace the Archbishop met long since considered it advisable to authorize the creation of a new parish, and the result is the erection of a handsome church, which will seat about 1,000 persons. The corner-stone was laid on Sunday by the Archbishop, assisted by a number of the clergy. The edifice, which is to be completed in about six months, will cost $40,000.

ST. PATRICK'S CHAKEL,

Located on Santa Clara and Eighth streets, and separate from the parish of St. Joseph, Father Joseph A. Gallagher is pastor, and Father Nardi, assistant. The latter devotes himself more particularly to the spiritual care of the Spanish-speaking population about Almaden. The former seems to set upon a plan of building together with the assistance of the people, and has erected a handsome and commodious church, which will seat 2,000 persons. Here, too, the corner-stone was laid on Sunday by the Archbishop, assisted by a number of the clergy. The edifice, which is to be completed in about six months, will cost $40,000.

THE REBELLION OF

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART SECOND.—(Continued.)

Wearied from his day's exertions, and comparatively at ease in mind, Talbot had neither thought nor consciousness for he knew not how long, till he was suddenly aroused by the noise of violence in the next apartment. "Spare me, spare me! I am a Christian bishop," cried a voice agonizingly piercing.

"His words were, 'Make away with the boddagh,'" exclaimed another: "we have no word for it, and we will do it!" Then came blows, groans and the sound of some one falling.

Talbot, at the first alarm, leaped to his feet. It was still so dark he could see nothing distinctly, and, for a moment, he forgot where he was. Instinctively he stretched out his hand for his weapons. They were gone. Recollection flashed upon his mind. "My heaven, it is the archbishop they are murdering!" he exclaimed, and, without waiting to search farther for his arms, rushed into the other room. Some one pushed past him as he burst in; he struggled with him for a moment, but, perceiving that the noise and tumult in the archbishop's chamber continued, and thinking himself still in time to save the old man, he let him go, and threw himself among those without. He had no weapon, but with his caked hands he struck down two of them; two more he dragged bodily off the prostrate churchman, furiously demanding who they were, and by whose authority they dared do violence to a Christian prelate under his protection: "Villains and murderers, who are ye? Is it, Sir John Talbot, captain of the guard, who ask. Hold off, ye dogs, would ye strike the minister of God? Ho, Art MacConnogher! Barry Ogel Redmond and Gilraspike! Treason, oh! turn out, ye heavy-headed knaves; here is murder done within your post."

As he spoke there was a trampling of horses in the street, and a blaze of torchlight came flashing through the door and window. The first object that caught his eye was the dead body of the archbishop lying on the floor covered with wounds, and almost naked, as he had been dragged out of his bed; but the murderers all, save two, were gone. These with their eyes disguised weapons in their hands, stood half irresolute, fecretly and apprehension strangely mingling in their looks. "What are ye, ye blood-thirsty and accursed villains?" cried Talbot.

"We are Tomas-an-Teeda's men," replied one of them, still panting from his fierce exhaustion; "and we have done as you see, Sir John Talbot, by the orders of our General."

"Bloodhound, it is false!" exclaimed Talbot. "Lord Thomas Fitzgerald is n? as main of Christian bishops."

"This was no Christian bishop!" exclaimed the other of the two vehemently; "and what we say, sir, is not false. This was an unchristian and malicious hypocrite, prelate as he was, and as well we have done is no more than we commanded us to say, and not so much as this false priest's treachery and malice have well merited."

"If Lord Thomas Fitzgerald has commanded this most baneful murder I will never draw my sword in his unnatural quarrel again!" cried Talbot; but ere he had said more Lord Thomas himself, attended by all his chief friends, was in the hall.

"What murder, Sir John Talbot? Who dares to say that I have commanded murder?" he exclaimed as he entered the apartment; but, almost stumbling over the dead body, which lay on the very threshold, he started back in horror and confusion. "Oh, my God, what is this?" he cried, and turned deadly pale. "Villains that ye are, what is this that you have done?"

"My lord, we have but done as your lordship commanded," answered one of the murderers, but his voice had lost its former confidence. "My lord, your lordship's words were: 'Make away with the clown.' We did it on these words that your lordship spoke. My lord, we have but played the part of faithful servants."

He would have pleaded more, but Lord Thomas interroped him.—"Nicholas Wafer, you have done the most disservice by this one blow than I would have dreaded from the swords of ten thousand Englishmen. My words were, 'Take the clown away;' I could not bear the sight of the man who had so foully wronged us all; but I take Heaven to witness I never meant that he should come by violence at the hands of any. 'Take the clown away!' were the words, Nicholas Wafer, and, by my troth, if I 66d that you have wilfully misconstrued by design, ye shall both hang, by the rood that right speedily, from the broadest oak upon Dromcondra."

"If, my lord!" cried Talbot. "Does your lordship not mean, then, to execute them out of hand?"

"Sir John Talbot," replied Thomas, "this is my injury, and it shall be redressed as I think fit."

"My lord, I say the injury is mine," cried Talbot fiercely. "Here is a Christian bishop murdered; here are the murderers, reeking from that accursed slaughter, and confessing that they are his—who did it, and here stand I to claim vengeance on the assassins, I care not by whom set on, or by what error in interpreting the words of any man. How comes it, my lord, that this holy prelate is dragged out of his bed by murderers in your lordship's train, and no notice given to me who held him in custody?"

"Sir John Talbot," replied Thomas, "there is no need to rouse a keeper who is so rarely at his post; this, sir, is not the first occasion on which you have left Artane contrary to your commands, on I know not what adventures in the camp and city of our enemies; I do pray God that these clandestine expeditions may have had a more honorable aim than I have heard associated with them. You were not summoned, Sir John Talbot, because you are seldom here to summon, and what dealings I desired with this ill-fated prelate I could prescribe without the presence or countenance of a keeper who was but chance-met at his post."

"My lord, whoever told your lordship that my absences, which have been two, from Artane—not against command, my lord Thomas, but at my own pleasure, as discretionary captain of this post—have had other than honorable aim, be, I say, a slanderer and a villain; and if your lordship produce him not, to make good his tale, then do you yourself, my lord Thomas Fitzgerald, receive my denial of the falsehood, and render me amends for this base injury in his stead."

"Insolent rebel!" exclaimed the enraged lord, and drew his sword to rush upon Talbot at the word, but those around withheld him, while his antagonist, all on fire for the fight, clapped his hand to his side; but no weapon was there, and he suddenly remembered that on awakening he could not find his sword.

"Villains, let me go!" cried Fitzgerald, where he stood striding over the archbishop's body, while Barnet, Travers and his two uncles laid him back, all slipping in the blood which made it unsafe to fight under their feet one pauble.

"Give him his sword, and let him come on!" shouted Lord Thomas; but Parez stepped forward, and said, "I am he who told this tale of Sir John Talbot: that tale I tell again, and I say further, that he, six several times, has left his post to practice with the enemy; that he is a traitor and a traitor, and that I will make good my words at peril of my body!"

"I claim that combat," exclaimed Talbot, "I accept the challenge, and, by the like! you have given, I will drive it down your false throat with my sword's point on any ground in Ireland!" cried Parez; but still Lord Thomas struggled with his withholders and called to give the knight his weapon, and let them fight it out. And now Talbot standing unarmed and alone in the midst of enemies, would have fallen an easy sacrifice to the hate of many there who thirsted for his blood, had not Art MacConnogher, with about a dozen of the Artane galloglass, suddenly made their appearance from the other apartment.

"Noble Sir," said Art as he entered, with shouldered battleaxe, and his skean stuck bare in his belt, "we are here to do your commands, as it is fit that true men should. Our sentries have been dismissed, Sir John, and their places supplied from my lord's own troops; but our guard was not permitted to be called out, or we should have been with you in obedience to better time."

"They the Lord Thomas' Art," said Talbot; "I am no longer your captain; Artane we could, I think, have held against the enemy, but you are here surprised by your friends."

"Dar fiamh sac chorp, Sir John; surprise or no surprise, I am here to do my chief's and man's bidding but your noblemess's!" cried MacConnogher, "and I have brought in Kern; we stand by the captain, farrah!" So saying he led to his men, and the little squadron was soon quite filled with the partisans on both sides. The gray of the dawn was now dimming the yellow torchlight, and it seemed as if the sun were desirous to rise on so bloody a spectacle, within that castle at Artane, as he had ever laid bare within the four walls of either cottage or castle; for the galloglass were so devoted to Sir John, that, though far inferior in number to the troop of Lord Thomas, they would have made any attempt to seize upon the dead body of the archbishop lying on the floor covered with wounds, and almost naked, as he had been dragged out of his bed; but the murderers all, save two, were gone. These with their eyes disguised weapons in their hands, stood half irresolute, fecretly and apprehension strangely mingling in their looks. "What are ye, ye blood-thirsty and accursed villains?" cried Talbot.

"Villains, let me go!" cried Fitzgerald, "Ha! what is this? the blade is bloody; villains, villains, where got you this bloody weapon?"

"It shall be redder yet!" exclaimed Talbot, little minding the fact which seemed so strongly to stir his adversary. "It will be red before the end of the day, and with the blade red in the blood of traitors; where got you the sword, Gowran Mac3nogh?"

"Where your lordship's sword slept last night, between it and the wall."

"Oh heaven!" exclaimed Parez, with such vehemence, and in a tone of such horror and indignation, that all present turned their eyes upon him, as he stood pointing at the weapon all smeared from point to hilt with gore, scarce yet cold upon the iron. "Oh heaven! red in the blood of a murdered bishop! Oh the treachery! oh the treachery! oh the baseness! but I shall be the last villany! Yes, my lord, and you, noble gentleman, this is not to be let be mistaken; the wretch who has himself confessed the murder, is the first, having concealed the evidence of his own guilt to become the accuser of his partners in the crime!"

"Why, ruffian, what wouldst thou say?" cried Lord Thomas, scarce comprehending the extent or purport of this new accusation.

"That you are yourself one of the shedders of the archbishop's blood!" cried Parez; "your sword dripping from the slaughter, is found concealed in behalf your bed; your face and hands are covered with the marks of the horrid deed; you dare not touch this murdered prelate's body—it would bleed afresh, if you did lay your impious hands upon it; and in the readiest way in which the good old man is hacked and mangled!"

"Hateful hypocrite!" exclaimed Talbot; "you know well this is a falsehood too gross to pass; are you not here, the bloody accuser, to prosecute one whom you may soon prosecute resemble, to outrage your Maker with the devilish mockery!"

"I have no such cause as you, John Talbot, to dread the vengeance of so outraged God; thank heaven, my hands are free of holy blood!" None present could help remarking that as Parez spoke his voice was broken, in the midst of all its vehemence, and his hands were clenched, as if repressing some strong struggle within him; the sweat, too, ran from his brow, though the passion he professed was far from being such as ought to throw a man into these cold shudderings; but just as Talbot was bursting out into another indignant reply, the voice of Travers, the Churchman, whom he had already so grievously offended, in the disputes which grew up the night before, was heard among the throng.

"Hear him not! he is but adding the guilt of falsehood to the damnation of murder! I have proof that he premeditated this crime; I have proof that it is not four and twenty hours since that hateful murderess was heard to threaten the life of Archbishop Alan."

"Ha!" cried Lord Thomas, "heard to threaten his life? This begins to look worse than will his ungrateful insolence, I could have wished it."

"Yes, my lord and gentleman," continued Travers, "when the bishops of the church of God lie pierced by the dagger of heretical assassins, it is no time to hold back the declaration of the truth; there is bond too binding or be loosed—no seal too sacred to be broken in such a time, and for such a cause as this. My lord, I was last night benought to administer ghostly consolation to one whose conscience troubled him for having listened to the impiety of a wretch who had vowed, in his presence, that neither sanctuary nor altar should shield an archbishop of the church for his revenge. That wretch was the same who now stands before you, having accomplished his most baleful purpose; and the prelate, whose life he then sought, is the same who now lies, the victim of that impious bate, a murdered man atour feet!"

"There is no need, Master Travers," said Talbot, his anger giving way at once to the coolness of a man who finds himself suddenly beset with difficulties that demand the exercise of all his faculties; "there is no need to make a merit of a disclosure, which I am free to know: he whom you confessed, was a serving man, and he can tell you that my anger against Archbishop Alan was caused by an unfounded suspicion: and that suspicion, my lord and gentlemen, could not have remained upon my mind till now, since, at the moment I received that ill-fated prelate from the wares—and I pay you, Master Travers, if I meant to take his life, why did I not leave him to their mercy?—but, I say, that this suspicion was removed the moment I boarded the stranded vessel, and that my real rage, in the first violence of my mistaken anger, ought not to be alleged against me now, to produce this serving man, and he will prove what I have said!"

"That servant is not now forthcoming," replied Travers: "but here is a seaman, who will tell your lordship how he heard Sir John Talbot, even in the wreck, when this error of his, which he alleges, could no longer have influence upon him, threaten to drive the archbishop through the surf on shore; say, now him violently despoil him of a strong box of jewels, which the same archbishop declared to be the property of the Church."

"I did," said a person in the crowd; and, moreover, I heard that knight call the archbishop a caitiff and a hypocrite."

"I know it all," cried Talbot; "save that my throat is parched, and my head is sick, like the other, prisoned with an 'if.' The jewels were the property of one then present, who claimed them by his hand, and desired having ever bestowed them on the Church; and for the chance which you took up arms to an evil hour, as well for me as for others, there is my hand to justice at your hands; hear what my galloglass will say in evidence of my desire to protect this unhappy prelate from injury and violence."

"By virtue of my baptism," said Art MacConnogher, "Sir John's last words to the effect of those who wish to acquire a good character at such a time as the present. A vic, vic deelish mo chree!" cried the poor fellow, the tears running down his cheeks as he spoke, "I stay with us—we will never do good without you; if you go, noble Sir John, if you go, I will go with you!"

"We will follow him over the ridge of the world!" exclaimed Barry ogo:

"Nephew," cried Sir Oliver, "this man is surely innocent."

"I Fail by, my boys," said Talbot, and the galloglass immediately drew back, and the fight was laid ordered. There was not a dry eye among them. "As you love my father's son," continued he, "let no man harm this knight; his life is safer than mine by the hand of his gossip, be true to the trust that nurtured us all! This night's slaughter is my misfortune, it is not, dar thrighe na fiamh ahm," I do not believe it the fault of any man of the clan Gerald! Farewell, ogo hon! Farewell, slan leat buile go brath!"

A tumult of lamentations burst forth from the whole band as he spoke, and they followed him in a tumultuous body to the street, weeping and lamenting. Talbot withdrawn at the first word he heard him address to the galloglass in Irish; for he knew the power he could, through that medium, at any time exercise upon them; and Lord Thomas, with Parez, now mounted and at the head of his band of followers, was already broken, and the pale light showed many a haggard countenance, but none more so than Parez's. Talbot passed 6ilm in silence, and with a glance of as much indifference as if they had never met. This seemed to cut him to the soul; for the thing rushed to his face; and he cried, "Sdeer! we shall meet yet where there will be none to put us apart!" Talbot made no reply, but called for his horse. The galloglass still hung around him as he mounted. "Give him!" cried Sir Oliver; "say but the word, Sir John," said he, with his arm over the neck of his charger; "say but the word, sir, and I will take my axe in the traitor's skull before he can bless himself!"

"Dar Dhia, no! Art MacConnogher, must I tell you again to let me go? Back, I say, to Artane as I desire, and this day's all—tamgat feat go leigh!" and without waiting another look on those he left behind, he put spurs to his horse and galloped off the ground. The master-feeling in his mind was exultation. He had kept his word with Dudley; he was clear of the whole matter; and he felt a calm assurance that, since he had done no wilful dishonour, the imputation of Parez could not prevail against him. On that charge, indeed, he had been bestowed a little too long over and over, in imagination, the triumph and joy with which he should have met his antagonist. "My way is clear now!" he cried.

This, he, by heaven, I could scarce have wished it better! No man can blame for this; and I will! I will! I was right—by the living God I was right! Dudley! Dudley has quit my score of all their slights and insults. Ay, if he had done me injury ten times as great, that look I gave him pays for all! How the caitiff writhed! As I am a Christian, I have had fair revenge! And Ellen, you little dream this morning that I would be on our way to Waterford, as you wanted last night, before either of us a day older. It will delight her poor heart to hear of it. Thank heaven, that I have the good news to carry her; it will be like the first gleam of sunshine after a storm of thunder."

By this he was at the Tolka. As he rode to the ford, he bethought himself of the gayed upon his hands and clothes. He dismounted, and washed his person clean of the pollution; but his buff coat was so saturated that he could not remove the stains. The thought then, for the first time, struck him, that there might be danger in showing himself. Travers was gone, no doubt, to Dublin, and would certainly repeat the accusation he had so strenuously alled in the hearing of the Council. Answer as he was, to be taken up with proofs of guilt so strong against him—nay, in his present circumstances, with evidence added to it by the hand of the galloglass—he could not but be thought of without a pang of fear. He was in the act of riding into Dublin he should and would go, but a few hours would make Ellen his wife; they might then leave Ireland in safety from the reach of pursuit before another day. Yes, to leave the country with this stain upon his name—nothing could have more thrilled his breast as sharply as the first. Well, he was at least conscious of his own innocence, and Ellen would believe him that he was so; what more could an outlawed man expect? He must make sure; he must not run the risk of being taken; his clothes must be changed; the bearded upper lip must be made bare; and the long dark curls, that played upon his shoulder, must be thinned and shortened.

Seeing the necessity, he lost no time in making preparations to comply with it. He rode to the house of a friendly citizen, a Catholic, announced his purpose, and dispatched a messenger to the city for such habiliments as he thought most suitable to the character he meant to assume—that of a native gentleman of some account.

The messenger delayed—the hour appointed for the ceremony was approaching —arrived—elapsed—and he could not go out of the doors, his entertainer with friendship and solicitude reminding him of the hazards, and urging on him every reasonable ground why he should rather wait till his might go in safety. Impatient as he was, he felt the necessity of submitting to a calamity so much more serious than the loss of a single hour, and he waited on, at last procured, and Talbot left the house so altered that he hardly knew his own image in the mirror. His rough coat of frieze plaid, tight to the leg, were strapped under light brogues of unstained leather; his coat, of the fine frieze of Waterford, was buttoned to the throat; the standing collar closely fitting at the neck, while the full skirts descended from a broad belt round the waist in plaited folds nearly reaching to the knee. Over this was cast his mantle, dark brown, short and of the Spanish cut, with fringed edges and a warm collar of silk thrums. His hat alone was English, for, to have appeared in the blue barrad of the country, after cutting off crummsel and coolun, would, in Dublin, have excited the animadversion of the citizens.

MINING INTELLIGENCE.

MARIPOSA COUNTY.

Dan Jones has leased the quartz mine near Quartsburg known as "Number Nine" and has about eight men employed getting out ore. They will give it a thorough trial as soon as the roads are in condition for hauling to the Mount Gaines mill. The prospect is reported very favorable.

BUTTE.

Says the Gravelite (Butte county) Record: On Friday of last week, Hendricks & Co., of Morris ravine, cleaned up a $5,000 brick. And so we go, $9,000 and $10,000 as a jump, with plenty of water and plenty of pay dirt. They have Table Mountain for a claim and Feather river for a dump, making one of the grandest claims in California. They have one mile of six-foot tail flume, and hurl 2,500 inches of water, under one hundred and fifty feet pressure, against their bank, thence through the flume.

CALAVERAS.

Success is the name of a quartz mine situated on Kelly's Gulch, about a mile and a half from Vallecito, and which has recently been incorporated in San Francisco, with a capital stock of $20,000. From a specimen of the rock shown to us recently from the mine we should judge the rock would pay $25 to $30 per ton. Calaveras is looming up in developments in mineral resources, and the time is not far distant when she will be the first county in the State in this respect.

We have intelligence of a very surprising yield of gold from the Horse-thief mine, located in the Jones Marle district. A recent crushing of fifteen tons produced $750—an average of $50 per ton.

A ten-inch vein has been discovered near the Valentine; the ore is said to be worth $50 per ton.

The Ohio Consolidated is still going down. The ore in the bottom of the shaft is 20 inches thick and worth in the neighborhood of $60 per ton.

The Bartolo, Last Chance, Blazing Star, Seminole and French Load are expected to start up soon. A rich discovery was made this week, a short distance west of those mines. The ore is about one foot thick and every portion of it shows gold pretty thickly. Mining operations generally throughout the country are promising well.

LASSEN.

The old Providence mine will be quickly developed as one of the great prizes of 1873; the work has advanced steadily and the progress made at the various points throughout. The sinking of the McDonald shaft is somewhat slower than those in the north, owing to having reached the hard cap rock; shaft down 113 feet from the surface, and is daily expected to intersect the vein.

Hayden Hill Mining Company continue to work in a spirited manner; the tunnel is run eight feet from the last cessation, and is now in a distant of 400 feet.

NEVADA.

The Union gave its readers on Tuesday last the regular monthly review of mining at Grass Valley, from which we collate as follows: The Idaho mine's monthly run closed on Saturday. The mill worked 22 days and gave gold to the value of $72,000. The usual dividend of $66,500 will be paid this week. Appearances under ground are, of course, as good as can be expected.

The Eureka mine has, with ten stamps, given about $47,000 for a month's run.

Slate ledge, or Perrin's, has done but little crushing during the month. Hauling commenced March 1st and the mill will be immediately started up. There are but 100 tons of good ore on the dump at the mine. The ledge is large in size but poor in mineral.

Daisy Hill continues to send out good ores, and has a good-sized dump ready for crushing. The last crushing gave $42 to the load.

Greenhorn mill and mine are working away night and day. The ledge is large and well defined vein. The crushing now going on will give something like $25 to the ton of ore.

Green Mountain mine, during its last month, made a run of 18 days with its 10-stamp mill, cleaning up gold to the amount of $2,345. The value of the sulphurets saved is not counted. The sulphurets are rich and heavy.

Howard Hill mine shows a most gratifying improvement. The shaft is down 350 feet, and from the bottom drifts have been run east and west. Both drifts are in fine paying good ore, with a ledge from two to two and a half feet thick.

The Independence Mining Company is still running a tunnel through Independence Hill. The tunnel is now in 375 feet, and the rock is very hard. During the last month a foot a day was averaged in running the tunnel. The ledge has not yet been cut, though stringers that bear gold are in the tunnel.

The North Star continues to have splendid ore in the new shaft. The mill will begin, at an early day, to turn out gold in paying quantities.

The Town Talk is doing very well. That mine has paid a profit, for two years, of $2,200 a month clear to two owners. Its gravel now shows that it will pay much richer in the months to come.

The Empire is doing well. For twenty-four days of last month the mill yielded about $12,000 with its twenty stamps. This includes sulphurets and clean gold. The gold shipped Thursday morning will be valued at $11,000.

The Transcript says: The Idaho Mining Company has about completed arrangements to dig a new ditch to run water in, from a point in the upper part of the town valley, connecting with the Snow Mountain ditch, and conveying the water to Grass Valley. The Company have purchased the right of way through the land of Murchie Bros., and all along the line. Work is to be commenced as soon as the weather will permit.

The North Bloomfield Gravel Mining Company have about completed their new ditch, from Humbug via Columbia Hill to French Corral. They commenced on it last fall, and have had between six and seven hundred Chinamen, and about fifty white men constantly employed. All the digging has been completed and operations have been commenced on the flumes at the various points between the two places.

PLUMAS.

Water commenced running through the Plumas ditch to Newton, last week, and one or two companies will start their pipes in a short time. Some very rich ground is now being taken from the Green Mountain ledge, near Cherokee, owned by Batchelder, of Greenville, and it is thought that the strike will develope at sage body of high-grade ore. Colonel Ikker has the best rigged set of diggings of Laporte. With an average water season, should the claims pay as well as they did last spring, he will take out over $100,000. Most of the mines at Laporte are waiting for a fresh supply of water, the severe snow storm of the past ten days having dried up what little water there was running in the ditches, having about five feet of snow.

NEVADA.

The Pioche Record, in its review for the week ending March 1st, says: The condition of the roads from mines to mill is such that hauling facilities continue inadequate, and ore has consequently continued to increase at the dumps, in quantities at some mines to embarrass operations. Few men, however, have been dispensed with, and developments below ground have been but slightly interrupted.

The mines of Bristol, twenty miles north of Pioche, are at this time attracting greater attention than ever before. The reports from there are of an extremely encouraging character, and a large bullion production is expected from Bristol in the next few months. From four to six hundred miners, we are informed, will be engaged in and about those mines when the working season fairly opens.

And also worthy of notice is the progress being made in the development of the ledges around the Highland, about seven miles west of Pioche, and the ledges between this point and that. Work on the new Mendota mill, at Highland, is being pushed with much energy, and vast quantities of rich ores are daily awaiting its completion.

Arizona.

The Arizona Miner says P. McAteer recently found a gold-bearing lode near his ranch in Kirkland valley. One hundred and twenty-five pounds of the ore, taken from the surface, was quite recently operated upon at Wickenburg, and yielded about ten ounces of bullion, worth about $175. The Mexican who worked the ore is anxious to be permitted to erect a furnace, etc., and commence regular working of the ledge. Plenty of wood and water within short distances of the mine. The placer miners are doing well and steadily, and will, no doubt, catch a great deal of placer gold.

The Coming Labor Strikes.

NEW YORK, March 10.—The impending strike of various trades seems to be near at hand. The Eight-Hour League claim to have $100,000 in the treasury, and say they have doubled their membership since the last struggle of last year. Carpenters, plasterers, stonemasons, bricklayers, stair-builders, plumbers and house-smiths are now working on the eight-hour system, although established with their present wages, they will strike against the old system of working ten in ten hours. The piano-makers, upholsterers, varnishers and cabinet-makers are working ten hours, but are holding secret meetings to discuss the expediency of another eight-hour strike. Over fifty different trades unions in New York are committed to the eight-hour movement, and the probabilities are that many branches of manufactures will be disorganized this Spring and Summer.

A small number of German journeymen shoemakers had a meeting yesterday afternoon, for the purpose of increasing the organization and to enable them to strike for higher wages. The speakers were sanguine that the movement would receive a great impetus when the busy season opens, and that a successful strike will be inaugurated.

It is reported from Philadelphia that the carpet trade is very seriously affected, and the manufacturers are unable to effect sales or procure advances on their very consignments. Several manufacturing firms contemplate suspending. A general weavers' strike is apprehended there, and other labor organizations have been secretly holding meetings. It is expected the strike will take place at an early date.

A Disease with a Thousand Symptoms.

Dyspepsia is the most perplexing of all human ailments. Its symptoms are almost infinite in their variety, and the forces and despondent victims of this disease change their symptoms from day to time, or every hours malady. This is due, in part, to the close sympathy which exists between the stomach and the brain, and in part to the fact that any disturbance of the digestive function momentarily reacts upon the liver, the heart, the kidneys, the nerves and affects, to some extent, every organ of the body. A medicine which will cure Dyspepsia must, necessarily, be one which will not only tone and invigorate the liver, possess a regular habit of body, brace the nerves, purify the blood, and in short restore to a mind diseased." It therefore the true and only specific for chronic indigestion is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, a famous vegetable restorative. It not only cures dyspepsia, but also constipation and consumption. Moreover, it is invaluable as a preventive of indigestion. No one who chooses can hold a more perfect sympathetic appetizer and stomachic than any of these. Take it after every meal, and before and after exposure to malaria, unusual fatigue or indiscretion in food. The first dose will sharpen appetite and the second or third will make digestion comfortable. Nervousness, biliousness, rheumatism, kidney and bladder complaints are also more promptly and permanently relieved by this genial invigorant than by any other remedy known to the pharmacopœia.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

JUST RECEIVED FROM IRELAND, AND SOLD by them by millions, a BASKET OF ST. PATRICK and HIBERNIA FAMILY (Illuminated in gold and colors), one and commercial in France, to be used in processions to acknowledge the country that gave him birth, makes a holiday of St. Patrick's Day, and gives himself up to rational amusement. But especially do patriotic Irishmen, those who will not recognize England's claim to govern their country, and who ardently long for the attainment of its independence, like to honor the sentiment.

By doing so they protest, in the most significant manner open to them, against the foreign usurpation which keeps their country marked by God with all the characteristics of a nation, in the condition of a despoiled and degraded province. For this reason do the gallant men, to whom the Republic has granted the honor of carrying its stars and stripes, in the grand parade in martial array. In those armed ranks there is not a single individual who would not cheerfully respond to the call of liberty in Ireland, and who would think it an enviable fate to die the death of a soldier combating for the national independence of the soil from which he sprung.

When Ireland is free, when the last relic of that has fallen its departure from Dublin, and the flag that waved so proudly on Monday in the streets of San Francisco shall float in triumph over Dublin Castle, perchance a festival may be inaugurated which shall in a great measure displace St. Patrick's Day. Then the 17th March shall be celebrated most fittingly in the temples of God, as becomes the anniversary of one who preached the gospel well, won a whole nation to the faith of Christ, and planted the true religion in a land where it can never be eradicated. But our preface has been long, and we must give our readers a full account of how the great day was celebrated and who they were that celebrated it.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES.

Mass was celebrated at St. Mary's Cathedral at half past 8 o'clock, at which the Grand Marshal of the day and his staff, attended by a body of the Knights of the Red Branch and the Hibernian Benevolent Society, in full uniform, and preceded by the Hibernia Band, marched to the Cathedral. At the conclusion of the Gospel, Father Prendergast ascended the pulpit, and preached a most eloquent panegyric of the Saint.

FLAG PRESENTATION.

About half past nine o'clock the Irish Nationalist Clubs and Societies wended their way to Hibernian Hall, where the two magnificent silk flags, manufactured by C. J. Hendry, were to be presented to the Knights of the Red Branch and the Boerke and Luby Clubs of the I. C., by the patriotic ladies of San Francisco. This hall is the property of the I. B. U., and was appropriately decorated on the occasion with flags, banners and festooned with flowers and evergreens. The platform at the end of the hall was also floated to imitate crumbling walls, around which gracefully clings with the fondness of death. On each side of the platform are painted like ancient castles, while in the background stands the round towered pagan Ireland. In front of and on each of the towers are the words of welcome and greeting; while in the center of the hall is a gigantic fountain, throwing a gentle spray many feet into the air. Soon by eleven o'clock the hall, with the occasion of the ball, the different arrangements and the illusion perfect—a veritable fairy palace, over a thousand gas jets were burning and the scene presented in well regulated harmony. In behalf of the ladies

Stepped forward and made the following handsome presentation speech:

CITIZENS AND SOLDIERS, SONS AND FRIENDS OF IRELAND: I have been requested by the committee of the patriotic ladies of San Francisco to perform a very pleasing duty; but, though I keenly appreciate the honor of the task assigned me, I feel how unequal I am to the task of adequately expressing the high and holy emotions with which our souls are stirred on an occasion like this.

Indeed, I realize how weak are words to portray the thousand sweeping memories which such a scene as this calls up from the depths of the heart, and how not our lips alone, but our hearts can best register and express the fond feelings which we have for—and which we cherish for—our dear, fair Island Mother.

STATIONALITY—

Irish Nationalists of San Francisco—to you who have battled on and off the Atlantic Coast and Ireland, before, we invite to unite into one common fold every one of your race, that they may participate in the glorious work we have undertaken—uniting with us in the bonds of fraternity, and with one another for freedom's sake. Such being our resolve, we have determined that the best test we can put to you to prove to you by our every act that the true patriots have been with us will be to present to each and all they love most on earth,

In the name of the Ladies, I accept this American flag, and the Irish Confederate, I accept this American flag, representing as it does the grandest flag of the grandest country in the world; and this, the ancient flag of Ireland, the proudest emblem of the past.

A Surprise.

Immediately after Mr. J. C. Talbot had finished his response to the address of Mrs. J. J. O'Brien, on behalf of the Irish national ladies of San Francisco, Col. M. C. Smith rose, and, with a pleasing address, presented to the National Band, the number splendid flag, in behalf of Philip Ryan and Co., Confectioners, in behalf of the donors. Mr. John Hassell presented a handsome flag to the Irish Regiment, which was received by Colonel Watson in behalf of the regiment. Both flags are American, and were made from fine silk manufactured by the Franco Californian Silk Manufacturing Co., of this city, of which Mr. Meagher is President.

THE PROCESSION.

At 12 o'clock the Grand Marshal, Hon. James Barrett, and staff took position on Fifth street, right resting on Folsom; and about half past twelve the line commenced to move, and marched through the following streets: Up Fifth to Howard, to Third, to Market, to Montgomery, to Jackson, to Kearny, to Market, to Ninth, countermarched to corner of Kearny and Bush streets, where the procession was reviewed by the Grand Marshal and staff.

Preceding the procession was a platoon of mounted police, to keep the route clear of obstructions. Thomas Feeley, Chief of Police, was in command.

The French Zouaves, Colonel Buffandeau, commanding, acted as avante guards. The Grand Marshal—mounted on a spirited charger, and wearing a rich green scarf, with gold bullion, a black hat, green and white feather, harp and star, and red, white and blue rosette—headed the line, accompanied by his Chief Aids, Colonel M. C. Smith and Daniel Sweeney, Esq. Next came the Chief of Staff, John Hassall, Esq., and his aids, Colonel F. F. Walsh and Major F. W. Black. Close after rode the general body of unassigned aids in horse equals, and mounted on spirited steeds—held; and when the hour came for those to be summoned out a fleet of available spars was announced! The President of the Day, Jas. J. Kenealy, Esq., in a brief but happy address, introduced Mr John McCullough, who read with fine effect, the poem written for the occasion, by Mr Daniel O'Connell

The Poem.

From misty and by wandering feet of Irishmen pressed,
From every crime where Irishmen have found a place of rest—
From exile and from mountain, from ocean tempest tossed,
Up over and without swells the voice of Irishmen to-day.

From late Alleghany's blood and fertile plains, with dashes dotted over,
From Colorado's rugged heights, from Ulster's rage and rave,
We Irish exiles now are met beneath the Irish flag
For green within our heart of hearts, grown greener here in the years.
Live memories of the shamrock soil, wet with Liberty's tears;
Where children, through stern defeat their votes and sacred have set,
Have still refused the tyrant's task—the lesson to forget.
Though cut of freeman's rule and right, now Israel in no realm,
Beyond the grasp of perjured sway, of judge and jail and chain!
A past our mighty deed have gilt with everlasting light—
A residence which illumines still the darkness of our night.

Full many a footstep, dark for years, was red—with fresh blood,
Where by side by side in ashes rake the Irish soldiers lay;
Full many a time, 'neath moon and sun, by Irish arms—their hour had fled—
On hill and pass, the native plan the English troop's assault.
And what has sprung from all our strife—what lasting good begot?
What from our dusky dags to-day, your songs of liberty?
Our answer by the grave of true sons is gallant stone.
The remnant by the dream the world, though serious-sible sadness

Has rearing chilled one heart-beat for her who gave us birth!
Has discipline paled our loving for the dearest land that blushes 'neath the sun?
The answer is the greeting, that swells from Irish breast,
To this or our gallant fathers loved—the day we hold the best.

Know we as not of those whose memories of us so fade—
That their fatherland in Ireland we called left behind—
Whose today the darling shamrock in shawl and in bonnet wear,
And glory still, spite all their wrongs, in cheering the grand.

In vain your rugged mountains, your wintry seas in vain,
Your breadths of somber forest, your leagues of barren land,
In East and West, through all the world, from Erin all forgot,
Joined soul to soul, and thought to thought, stand Irishmen to-day!

We've never loved her better than now, 'mid all her sorrow;
We've never had so strong a hope to half a brighter morrow;
For on her shores are tongue and pen, and trade of peaceful might,
To transmute to the fleet of the wrong and bear aloft the right.

And every rustling banner we've conquered in the day
Is every ivy-mantled tower that totters in the fray,
Is every so-called descendants of the great of sword and word,
Is the motive to see the end of Mother Ireland's wrong.

No font or difference of creed o'erclouded us in battle-line,
We're Irishmen—and, North or South, we love the kindred blood!
God bless you, land of memories, our darling isle, our holy soil—
Bless the leaf that clothes to-day the sod we'll call to-morrow.

At the conclusion of the poem, Mr McCullough was greeted with applause, and Mr. Kenealy introduced Mr. J. D. Sullivan, who sang Andrew Cherry's pretty ballad, entitled

The Green Little Shamrock of Ireland.

Sweet is my native land, dear little shamrock of Ireland.
Land of the brave and free, dear little shamrock of Ireland.
There's a spot in the dear little shamrock of Ireland.
Which to my heart is dear than all the world beside.

The dear little plant that springs from our soil,
When its three little leaves are extended,
Denote hope and a wish a happy fate should gain,
And sentiment by patriots be befriended;
And well learned by the brag, through the world, through the mirkland,
From the rich and gold branch, like the shamrock of Ireland.

The Chairman of the Day, Rev Thomas Hussey, was next introduced. Father Gibney's name was received with cheers, which having subsided, he delivered the following oration:

Oration.

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: At each succeeding year brings around the festive day of Ireland's patron saint, he with whom, more than on land, is aroused in the breast of Irishmen at home and abroad. Whether within the confines of the immense continent, in Australasia, on the burning plains of India, or upon the green isles of old Erin—at sea, and in whatever spot of the habitable globe the Celt is found, there he worships instinctively true to Faith and Fatherland.

Like the first days of other saints, the 17th of March was set apart by the Church for the special purpose of honoring the memory of the nation's apostle, and of receiving thanks for the boundless reward by the light of faith. But, almost from the days of Patrick, the converse of the saint and the type of the figure of the people became identical. The one stood for the other in times of prosperity, and both flourished together in the Green Island, though sometimes sad tears have fallen from the eyes of the Irish mother.

Has receiving chilled one heart-beat for her who gave us birth?
Has discipline paled our loving for the dearest land that blushes 'neath the sun?
The answer is the greeting, that swells from Irish breast,
To this or our gallant fathers loved—the day we hold the best.

THE LYNCHING OF MATTHEW TARPEY.

The lynching of MATTHEW TARPEY by armed mobs from Watsonville, Salinas and Monterey was an occurrence to be deplored by all lovers of law and order. This assertion holds equally good whether the unfortunate man was, or was not, guilty of the horrible crime imputed to him. In either case he should have been left to the action of the proper authorities and to the judgment of the established tribunals. The plea that, if he were so left, he might possibly have escaped punishment, does not furnish any palliation, much less justification, for the conduct of the "Vigilantes;" because, if it prevailed generally, the country would in a short time be utterly given over to anarchy, and all law but that of the strong hand would be ignored. It is wholly incompatible with the first principles of civilized government that armed mobs should be permitted to set themselves up as the judicial courts, and undertake the punishment of criminals or of individuals whom they chose to consider such. This rule is so universally recognized that had the tragedy of Monterey been enacted anywhere else but in the boasted land of liberty, the ringleaders would ere now be lying fast-bound in prison with an indictment for wilful murder hanging over their heads. For, according to the statutes of every Christian nation, and according to the dictates of eternal justice, these men are just as much murderers as the wretches who are legally consigned to the executioner. It is highly probable that no effort to punish them will ever be made, but this circumstance will only serve as a humiliating confession of the weakness of the law and the cowardice of those who are trusted with its ministrations. Considering the frequency of tragedies like that of Monterey and the invariable failure in bringing the perpetrators to justice, it is impossible for intelligent men in any part of the world to have the slightest respect for the administration of law in California, and it can be no wonder if the population of our State is regarded as being chiefly composed of men with the habits and character of Ishmaels.

So much for the criminality of lynch-law in MATTHEW TARPEY'S case. But if he was guilty of any more serious offence than a homicide, which would be sufficiently expiated by a short term of imprisonment, supposing that he would not be acquitted altogether on the ground of justification. The unfortunate man claimed, in the first instance, that the shot which killed Mrs. NICHOLSON was purely accidental, and that he had not the slightest intention of taking anybody's life. Of course, very much weight will not be attached with the sweeping title of evidence in favor of the truths of Christianity, and, like drowning men, they clutch at the veriest straws in the vain and foolish hope that they will sustain them.

With Irishmen of this class, who make large pretensions to patriotism, and with individuals wishing to weaken or break the bond which links the Irish nation to Catholicity, any favorable idea is that there exists an irremovable opposition between loyal love of country and attachment to faith. They dare not put them directly in the scales, one against the other, for they well know that every man with Christian instincts in his soul would unhesitatingly give preference to the creed which is his solace in this life and must be his glory in the next. So they make a separating, a very plausible, but a very artificial and a very false distinction. They attempt to divide Catholicity into two branches—the religious and political. They profess to give all belief, respect and obedience to the former; but, as "independent men" who are able "to do their own thinking" they will just venture to criticise the latter. Whenever they discover what they often call "the political Papacy," they find so much to censure that they fairly get choked with indignation. They are kind enough to find no fault with the tenets of faith, but somehow or another they light upon the unhappy supposition or discovery that during ages the Popes, the supreme rulers of the Church, the vicegerents of Christ, have been traitorous foes to liberty and irreconcilable enemies of progress. It is nothing to these people that every victory which the toiling masses gained over absolutism and feudalism was chiefly owing to the action and influence of the Catholic Church. They reck little of the indisputable fact that the Sovereign Pontiffs were always foremost, and not unfrequently alone, in the patronage of learning and the promotion of science. They shut their eyes to these things because it does not answer them to see them. Sometimes they are condescending enough to give what they imagine is sustainment of their position a proof of the correctness of their assertions.

For example, when talking of the Irish question they are very fond of citing Pope ADRIAN'S Bull to HENRY II. of England, respecting his intended interference in the domestic affairs of Ireland, as incontrovertible evidence that the "political Papacy" was always hostile to our country's "Home Rule;" they say, if we have an English Pope selling to an English King, for a money consideration, the right to invade, conquer and ruin a free and independent country," Leaving aside altogether the many and grave reasons for doubting the authenticity of this Bull, which have been dealt with in a most masterly manner by the Most Rev. Dr. MORAN, Bishop of Ossory, and, for the sake of argument, granting it to be genuine, it would require but few words to show that it had no influence whatever, either direct or indirect, on the subjugation of Ireland by the Normans. In the first place, the invasion was not proposed by the Pope, but by HENRY himself; and the Bull does not confer, but sanction the enterprise on the assumption that such and such things were its chief objects. In fact, HENRY'S design, as represented to the Pope and as favored by him, was an admirable project, and deserving of the encouragement of not alone the Sovereign Pontiff, but of every good Catholic. We say, as represented to the Pope, because the purpose for which the English King obtained the sanction of ADRIAN and the purpose which he really meditated and achieved, were two different and distinct things. He asked permission to restore order and secure the recognized right of the Holy See, and he got it, as it was perfectly within the competency of the Pope as the spiritual head of both nations fully authorized and universally acknowledged by the Christian princes of those days. He did not pretend to aim at a permanent occupation of the island, and the alleged Bull contains no word or phase authorizing such a course. More—, when Henry landed with the work of restoration he did not produce the Bull, or, a seal to it as his grounds for action, or indeed, allude to it in the remotest way. He by the edict of Injunction declared that the only object of this industry is not equalled anywhere, yet it requires in a combination of capital to develop it." The consumption of gas in the country is estimated at $40,000,000 annually. If we manufactured that, we ourselves we could save for our citizens $24,000,000 a year—money enough to give profitable employment to two million men, women and children.

Unfounded Claims.

The Call is a good general newspaper, but it is addicted to the fault of self-laudation to an extent which at times carries it beyond the bounds of decency. Its issue of Wednesday contained this puff:

The Call yesterday devoted nearly seven columns to the examination. It occupied two and a half PAGES ENTIRE PUBLISHED.

Now, the Irish in THE MONITOR published a large extra edition at half past 8 o'clock in the afternoon of St. Patrick's Day, containing the full proceedings of the day—fuller than the Call of the following morning—omitting not a single fact of importance; and we gave as an extra copy of this extra to the Call, from which it calmly compiled its report, without, however, giving us credit. It was we who got up the Grand Mass Meeting and Procession of Father O'Keefe's Reception, and the speeches of Rev. O'Brien and Mr. Tobin at Metropolitan Hall.

MURDER NEAR WATSONVILLE.

THE ACCUSED LYNCHED.

WATSONVILLE, March 14.—Matt. Tarpey, an old resident of this place, accidently shot and killed a Mrs. Sarah Nicholson last night, who was living on a tract of land formerly owned by Tarpey, about five miles from town. Tarpey, it seems, was trying to get his land back, and undertook to intimidate the parties holding it to return it to him. Tarpey was taken to Salinas City, where the indignation against him was so great, that it was deemed advisable to take him to Monterey; but this precaution did not save his life, as the following telegrams show:

SALINAS CITY, March 17.—Since Tarpey was taken to Monterey Jail on Saturday last, the fearful excitement prevailing has been on the increase, and aroused men from all portions of the county, and from Watsonville, have congregated here and at Monterey.

Last night Sheriff Wasson came from Monterey, and returned with a strong body of men to guard the jail and the prisoner. To-day, up to twelve o'clock,

OVER ONE HUNDRED MEN,

Well armed, had assembled in Salinas. The report was then circulated that Judge Breen, County Judge, had telegraphed an order to the Sheriff to bring Tarpey to Salinas City for examination. A

CAVALCADE OF HORSEMEN,

And fresh men from all parts came flying around, started out to meet the prisoner, and Deputy Sheriff Jake Less accompanied the party, with an order from the County Judge to bring Tarpey to Salinas for examination. It had been understood that the legislature, under the new constitution, the Sheriff, taking the jail in Monterey, would escort Tarpey to here.

The cavalcade left Salinas at 1 P. M., and continued on the road without meeting any one until

IT ARRIVED IN MONTEREY,

Eighteen miles distant, when it was stated that armed men had been drawn from under the floor of the jail and in the cellar doors with sledges, and that the slightest opposition Tarpey was in their power.

As they emerged from the jail with him in custody, a wife and child of the slayer, who were near, rushed forward, and with heartrending cries clung to the prisoner with the most pathetic intensity of feeling that they had to be separated from him by force. Everything by was Tarpey's aged mother and sister,

PLEADING IN VAIN FOR MERCY.

But a few minutes sufficed to bind Tarpey securely. Then he was placed in a two-horse wagon, and surrounded by about fifty armed men and the teams. The Regulators moved slowly out of the town, Tarpey's wife and child following on a run and unnoticed, and who gave him all the spiritual consolation his case called for.

Tarpey's Statement.

Matt Tarpey's brother, Martin, was formerly engaged in the produce business in this city, but is now at Pioche, acting as superintendent for the Washington and Creole Mining Company, while a younger brother, Michael, is in the employ of the Meadow Valley Mining Company. His mother and two sisters reside in this city, and the family are highly respected. His mother, who is very aged, and one sister left here for Monterey Sunday morning. Tarpey forwarded to his family the following statement of the shooting:

Wednesday last, I moved a house from one part of my land to another. The night of Wednesday the deceased and persons living with her took possession of the house. On Thursday my man went to fix up the house, etc., of the house. He was driven off by these parties; told he would be shot if he did not leave it instantly. He returned to Watsonville and informed me of the fact. I endeavored to get one or two parties, peace officers, to accompany me, but failed. Believing in another county, they refused. I went then alone. Getting to the house about 2 P. M., I heard that I took to be one woman and several men in the house, consulting, singing and applying themselves, etc. I endeavored by shooting off my gun, intimidating them, to have them leave. I failed in that. Then went to town again and endeavored to get some peace officers to accompany me, but failed. Returned to the place and watched the parties until they left the house, which they did about 2 A. M. I went to get possession also without resorting to violent measures. I remained on the ground.

About 7 A. M. the deceased, accompanied by a man, returned toward the house. Being in my own right, within forty yards followed a boy. I was standing by a tree, and stepped out to sight and command the boy. Before I could get out I was knocked down by some person, and my gun got off of the premises. His manner and acts showed he wished to fight me. Being unarmed, thought I would not fight. He was abusive, and said I was a——of a bastard that ever lived. He struck me kept pushing him off, driving him back and requesting me not to shoot. I repeatedly told her there would be no shooting if they would get off the premises and stay off. After I had driven them some seventy or eighty yards, he partially tore himself from the grasp of the woman. At the same time, directly in front of me, I saw a pistol. Heretofore the belligerents and farmers of that vicinity had used clubs in the fights, the latter consisting of axe handles, etc. The pistol was in the hands of a man who had been under contract of sale. The contract, it is understood, has been given up on account of the rocks, of which the amount unearthed from the land is enormous.

A very serious accident occurred to a boy named Wilson on Saturday afternoon. Matt Mahan, a brakeman on the construction train of the Southern Pacific Railroad, was at Mid Bay, laid his hatchet, and was thrown on the train. Wilson, a boy about 12 years of age, the hatchet, crushing it in a fearful manner. He was taken to the hospital, where his wounds were dressed by Dr. Cooper, and he is now doing well, but the sight of his eye was so great that he expired under the operation.

The promises of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company that the track shall be laid on the north bank of the Columbia River from Kalama to Portland, over the ground which is now occupied by the Oregon and Califonia road company, is not likely to be fulfilled. The Columbia River Railroad Company has already gone from Oregon and Idaho to get the right of way on the north bank of the river, and Clarke's Fork above the lake, so that no difficulty will be encountered in the way of the location of steam communication between Seattle and Portland. The Columbia River Railroad Company is now engaged pushing to their terminus, and will have a steamer on the river to connect with the road. The latter road has already been completed, and the body was covered with snow. Carefully dressed.

The Harbor Commissioners have ordered a rent in the wharves between Jackson and Pine to be sent with wheelbarrows, cobblestones, etc., and advertise for proposals.

Major Harry Larayne, an Englishman of distinction, has been elected by the Legislature of Nevada Commissioner of Immigration. He is the only gentleman who has ever been elected to a civil office in that State. He is a thorough democracy and liberty. In connection with the appointment, bells were rung, and prayer the Baptist and Presbyterian churches. The Governor-elect of Nevada is a member of the Episcopal Church, and was sworn in by Bishop Kip. The Legislature seemed first, however, to have been organized by the election of Hon. Thomas Wells as Speaker. The latter is a Catholic gentleman, and a member of the Legislature.

Calah Clubing, the celebrated lawyer, wrote a sixteen-page brief to convince the Supreme Court that his client, Caldwell, had not been guilty of bribery to obtain his office. It would take a refugee, with more pages than the Waverley novels combined, to convince the people that Caldwell ought not to have been expelled.

St. Joseph's new Convent in Sacramento, was dedicated on Wednesday forenoon of this week by the most Rev. Archbishop Alemany. It was crowded by a large number of persons. After the formal ceremonies were concluded, the Most Rev. Archbishop delivered an eloquent and appropriate address. The rooms of the building were tastefully decorated.

A mission, conducted by Rev. Fathers McGill and O'Brien of Los Angeles, was commenced in St. Patrick's church, Mission street, on last Sunday, which will continue for two weeks, closing on Sunday, March 30th.

A NEW MONASTERY.—We understand that the Dominican Fathers are immediately to commence the building of a monastery near the Church of St. Dominic now being built on Bush street, between Fillmore and Steiner. It will be one hundred feet long by thirty six feet wide, with high basement and attic. It may not be out of place to state here, as an evidence of the spirituality of the Church, that eight different religious orders have been established in or seventeen ecclesiastics now in the priory at Benicia. One-half of these have been ordained within a few months, where the confessions of the people of the interior may be heard; and the number will be increased as the wants of the faithful may require.

Very Rev. Father McGill, President of St. Vincent's College, Los Angeles, will give a mission at Santa Cruz, commencing on the 6th April (Palm Sunday) and continuing for a fortnight. Meehan is a most gifted preacher, and his mission in Santa Cruz cannot fail of producing good fruit.

RAILROAD RUMORS.

—Information comes to us from such a source that we have reason to doubt of its correctness, that the San José railroad is now in the hands of bonds of Thomas A. Scott. We are informed that a arrangement was made at Washington prior to the application of Scott to have the Act of Incorporation of the Texas and Pacific Railroad so amended as to authorize the Company to purchase or construct branch lines. The statement we believe, is that Scott has purchased from Governor Stanford Rides "and" Maryland. He then had the power to construct a road from Stockton to San José, and for which purpose he has let contracts of sale. The contracts, it is understood, have been given to parties in charge of the work, of which the amount unearthed from the land is enormous.

Our Foreign Immigration.

It is by no means strange that scores of the European Governments are saddened by all the means in their power to encourage emigration. The vast agricultural tracts derived by this country from its tide of foreign population, drawn by the Land Grabs, will show that there is good cause for the Old World's panic. Here is an extract from its plaint:

Last year 400,000 foreigners were landed at the different seaports, or, in other words, for every 80 of the whole population of the Union was at the end of the year 1 foreigner. The enormous capital value represented by these arrivals are not unknown. It is calculated that, on an average, each of these foreigners brings with him about fifteen or seventeen sovereigns now in England, the priory at Benicia. One-half of these have been ordained within a few months, where the confessions of the people of the interior may be heard; and the number will be increased as the wants of the faithful may require.

In Marysville

The day was celebrated by High Mass in St. Joseph's Cathedral, Right Rev. Bishop O'Connell officiating, after which Father Kelly, of Colusa, pronounced a panegyric. ## THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

Thus equipped, Sir John Talbot with rapid strides sought the city gates—the English furniture of his horse prevented him from riding. He posted up from the bridge, unmindful of the approving glances of many a Saxon burgher's daughter, admiring the tall Irishman; hurried past Christ's church, and down Nicholas street, abandoning aside the throng of the market with the step of a man well accustomed to have way made for him. "Way, there, you knave," cried he to one fellow blocking up the narrow passage with his cart.

"God's mercy, Teague!" replied the man of English blood with a start, but took no further notice.

"Out of my way, rascal!" cried Talbot, seizing him by the collar, and flinging him to one side; the fellow, who fell among the potato-dealers' baskets, rose, cursing furiously; but he had no wish to try the strength of the audacious native's arm a second time.

"Ay, ay," he exclaimed; "by the devil, things are coming to a pretty pass when wild wood-kern walk the streets of Dublin like born English gentlemen!"

"He's mere Irish," said another; "stick your knife into him, Peter—what about the thirty shillings?—we'll club for the fine if it ever be levied."

"Beame," replied Peter, "Irish as he is, I would not like to lie by subscription."

"By my faith, and it is well you did not take me at my offer, Peter; for now that I look again he is a scatterned Irishman; he has neither gibb nor hair upon his upper lip. Egad, it were as well not to meddle with him; 'tis five pound if it be a penny for such a fellow's case."

"He is main strong in the arm," said Peter, "we his life worth what it may."

Meanwhile Talbot was at Nicholas street; another minute placed him at the door of Dame Kesling's house. "Hah! Have I kept them waiting?" he cried, as he entered the hall; but the servant locked at him in mute astonishment. "Why, Lynch," cried Talbot, "do you not know my voice? come to you as one of your own countrymen?"

"God be good to us, and is this you, Sir John? May I never see glory if I did not think it was one of Tomas ane Feola's Irish captains from beyond the pale—a Tierna More at the least.

"Well, Lynch, it is as you see; be silent, Lynch: I have reasons to make me wish to pass with the crowd as thus which you suppose; but lead me to the gentlewoman, quick—is Father Thomas here?"

"Ah, Sir John, you will have to go to the cathedral now! I never thought you would have been so slack upon the morning that they are in it. Did there it billed left for you by Dame Margaret; that will tell your noblemen why they have gone before." Talbot snatched the letter, and, with a sudden tumult at his heart that made the writing swim for a moment in his eyes, read as follows:

"DEAR KINSMAN: We waited for you till long after the hour appointed; and Father Thomas having to assist at High Mass in St. Patrick's, takes us with him, as well for the performance of our devotions as to afford, if you should come during our absence, an opportunity of still accomplishing your desires to-day; for after Mass he will remain, in expectation of your coming, an hour in the little chapel between the sixth and seventh pillars of the nave, upon the left hand as one enters. Should you not come within that time we will return to the Gate; but Father Thomas, being noticed to attend some other ceremonial, cannot accompany us. So, if you come not, you must wait till the morrow; so, dear kinsman, if you do come before the hour after Mass has passed, you will find her that you wot of there, as I have told you, along with your loving kinswoman, M. K."

Talbot had scarce read the whole till he was on his way to the cathedral. The sun was shining brightly on the huge tower, and making all the lying battresses stand out like bars of silver from the dusk bulk of the building. Fair as the scene was to a discerning Nicholas Gate, with the open field before him, and the great cathedral in the midst, with all its battlements and pinnacles tipped with the sunbeams and glittering against the blue sky, Talbot bestowed scarce a look upon its beauties, but hurried round to the great western doorway, and entered the cathedral, panting from his haste, and half forgetful of the accustomed observances of his religion.

"Are you a heathen, master Kern," said one standing near the door, "that you touch not the holy water and enter the house of God with your cap on your head?"

"God forgive me," said Talbot, dipping his fingers in the stone font that projected from the jamb of the great doorway, and reverently crossing himself; "God forgive me, for a sinner as I am; but I come on such an errand as might well make a man forget to bless himself."

The citizen, astonished at his good Keg Bah, and thinking he came from some dying person for a priest, made way, and Talbot hurrying into the aisle, passed up to Father Kesling's confessional through the shrine of the kneeling crowd, the chief either side of which extended half way down the nave, for it was a solemn High Mass, and the citizens, delighted to get crowds their wives, had flocked to St. Patrick's that morning in unusual numbers. The choir was large, and on, and through the great arches of the screen and rood-beauty stalls could be seen crowded with knights and ladies kneeling between the double rows of white surpliced singers; the pale lamp-light emitted from the windows with the broad day about the near end; but toward the altar, where none else was admitted, its yellow radiance made all the hair seem like jars and carved work of the hanging gilt-copper shrine with an indistinct, tender glimmer gold. Father Keating's confessionalia was an ancient and grotesque wooden chapel, built against one of the great pillars of the aisle, with its little prie-cinct railed in, and a lamp burning before an image of the Virgin over its entrance. Talbot found it closed; but to have gone in search for his kinswoman among the crowd of noble in the choir, would have been both unbecoming and in all probability fruitless. His hand down, therefore, with his arms resting on the low rail, and swelled the conclusion of the services in fluttering and anxious expectation. His mind could his mind to devotion; he had twice been on the point of happiness, and almost twice been snatched almost from his grasp by sudden calamity—like might be the third time—he might have been offended with him for not keeping his appointment—the misfortune might be there applicable for as his wait—there was no remedy as to who the wife was he could the power of God to help him before; and yet he could not listen to the solemn music, and see the people around kneel in adoration, without approaching himself that one whose happiness so much depended on a rite of the Church, could listen to the sounds of that Church's most essential sacrifice thus unmoved by tender feelings of devotion. He heard the little bells tinkling with their tongues of silver; he could hardly tell as if in presence of the Host; he heard the blessing, and saw the people bending to receive it, but could scarcely tell that he participated in the benediction. At length, then, Mass was over, and the people rose, but those within the choir kept their places as many who had knelt near the screen, and could have heard the service; they appeared to await a further ceremony. Talbot knew not what; but he could perceive that there was some important preparation going on among the clergy, who passed and repassed from the side doors to St. Mary's chapel, their vestments glittering dazzlingly as they came out into the sunshine of the aisle. He was getting up on the long benches at the dean himself withdrew, his robes shining like flashes of fire as he crossed each bar of the sunshine lying across the narrow passage from every window, when, with a joyful start, he found those whom he sought by his side.

"Dear kinswoman!" cried he, extending his hand to Dame Kesling, and she drew back in dignified amaze, and even Eileen, who was leaning blushing on her arm, looked at him for a moment in equal ignorance; but a few words explained all. "Ah, Eileen," he cried, when he had done so, "you did not think I would soon fulfill my promise; well, I have left them without whose absence, although I would not be had carried better friends; but come, my love, leave now upon me. Dear Father, take to your blessed work. For I take a supplicant at heaven's gate till the words are said."

"Come in then, my children: I have little time to lose," replied Father Kesting, leading them into his little oratory, which, however scarcely more than sufficient to give them room; "I have," said he, "many higher duties to attend to to-day; something has happened, I know not what, but I will have to take a part; the signal as much for me as he was going out; so kneel down, my children, for I must tie this knot with what speed I may." The ceremony was performed, and Talbot and Ellen arose, man and wife.

"Now, sister," said Father Thomas, as he blessed Dame Kesling's cheek, after saluting the bride, "I will you return to Nicholas Gate, or wait for us? I may perhaps be able to accompany you home yet, if you will but wait the conclusion of the service, which cannot now be long; I will give you places under the dean's gallery in my own stall, if you will wait for me."

They all accepted gladly, and he led them into the choir. Every face was turned to the strong power of the Church rashly or against all offenders; for God may, in his anger against the nation, give the bodies of his people, for a warning to the sword, yet will He not surely destroy their souls for the our great cause, nor cast them forth utterly from the flock of Christ. But the enemy watched, and, as he ever is, was marshaling the destruction of souls, has this day instigated some children of Belial to a deed the most heinous and abominable that has ever stained the earth since the times of the martyrs. Violent hands have been laid upon a minister of God!"—there was a shudder among the congregation, and Talbot involuntarily began to use fearfully fast—the dean proceeded, "the blood of a Christian bishop has been spilled—the life of the Archbishop of Dublin has been taken away."

Many of the females present uttered loud cries of horror; Dame Kesling clasped her hands and shrieked, and Eileen leaned and clung on Talbot's shoulder, shuddering, as he pressed the arm that was below his own, as if he dreaded its withdrawal, or arranged her mantle about her husband's shoulder.

"Oh, no, no—it was the thought of your threats against the archbishop—I cannot bear to think of them; woe to what it has come. You will never be able to have his forgiveness now."

"Hist," said Talbot, with an earnestness that made her start, "whatever you hear, have trust in me. They have charged me—but no matter—I am happy; but could you send out of this?"—but before he could draw her farther the dean was proceeding to relate the circumstances of the murder.

"And now," he continued, "the said traitor residing to Athos, where the archbishop say, commanded two of his squires, Nicholas Wafer and John Tellog, to bring forth his prisoner; they dragging the archbishop from his bed, brought him before the imperious rebel, who, not being able to abide the sight of such a dishonor done an aged man and a Christian bishop, did utter some such words as these: 'Take the clown away,' which they, willfully misinterpreting—for he spoke in the Irish tongue—did then and there with their knives hack the said archbishop in pieces!"

Cries of terror and execration burst out from every part of the church. Talbot's breath come more freely, for he had half expected to hear his own name along with those of the murderers, and was debating whether to stand up and openly deny the charge, or lift Ellen in his arms and bear her out of hearing of it; but he thought the danger was over, and that the fact of the married curses of the two who had been named; but the dean continued—"Now, then, the inhuman butchers, being satisfied, the said traitor, John Talbot"—

Talbot put his arm round his bride's waist and drew her close to him; he could feel her heart beating fast as she knelt, and his own was again at his throat; he breathed hard and listened—"the said traitor, to whose chamber the aforesaid cast, having by, and when he already had been heard to threaten his life three several times, is now found to be bleeding from his dagger buried in the murdered prelate's breast, and his sword all bloody from the sacred slaughter, is now found to have fled, concealed beneath the bed." Dame Kesling screamed aloud, and fell fainting backward; Talbot started up to lift her from the ground, and Ellen strove to rise from her knees, but she could not.

"Ellen, I am innocent!" he exclaimed, "I am cruelly wronged. As I hope to see the brightness of heaven, I never harmed a hair of the archbishop's head!"

"Thank God!" she cried, faintly, "yet these threats, these threats!—Oh, say again that you are innocent."

"Upon my honour, I am."

"Oh, my God, they will excommunicate you!"

"They dare not do so. If they do, by the bright heaven, I will not endure it! Here, Ellen, love, let me take your head upon your lap, and do not let your heart fail you, for I will see this out. They dare not excommunicate me without trial. His stood up, gazing boldly on the dean and the assistants, neither the clergy under the glittering look of Kealiow, whose eyes were fixed on him throughout, nor shrinking even from the sight of the lady whom he recognized in the background, prompting the condemnation. It was with a loud and triumphant voice that he uttered the words—"Archbishop of Dublin has been killed!"

DERRYMORE, Cal., March 3, 1873.

DR. ADAMS—Dear Sir: Yours of the 10th ult. received, also a lock of testimonials, of which I have used but little—my health had improved so that I considered myself well. Now I am troubled with a cough without pain, and a general debility. I would send you some testimonials, but I do not know any person in this section who has used your Sarsaparilla. I will say, however, that I have used it in my family of the best physicians in the country, and have used many kinds of medicine, but was growing bad, my eyesight weak. I had given up all hopes of ever seeing well again. Your Sarsaparilla would give you the first trial. After six weeks trial I was entirely well. I was a stranger's influence that has ever been established. My brother and my eyesight are as good as they were before I took it. I would recommend all those afflicted with disease of any description to give Dr. ADAMS a trial. Yours very truly,

DEAFNESS AND CATARRH

Cured Where All Else Had Failed.

An Interesting Case—Dr. Atkin Always Ahead—Cured from J. L. Fields Esq., of the California Loan and Trust Co.

I had for years been afflicted with Deafness and Catarrh, which every cold aggravated, and had entirely lost the hearing of my left ear, and could hear but little with the right, and that very indistinctly. Their treatment, which I had undergone, had failed me entirely, though with scarcely any hope, applied to Dr. Atkin, No. 22 Sutter street, which he carried out by Inhalations, Gargles and discharges from the head, and in a few weeks I found myself cured, and my hearing restored, and I have had no return of the disease since, and I take pleasure in recommending any afflicted to procure a similar cure. Dr. Atkin's treatment is based upon common sense principles, and is always ahead as to skill, sacrifices and success. Thanks to Dr. Atkin for all the new remedies and improvements in his profession, in fact appreciated by the public. Dr. Medical Adviser.—Dr. Wm. K. Doherty's medical and surgical Institute is becoming a necessity to the welfare of our males and health of our citizens; and his sympathy reputation, although in many cases severe, is for the benefit of all, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had been pronounced incurable by the best medical men in the land, but who, after placing themselves under the treatment of Dr. Doherty, were restored to perfect health, and are now living witnesses of the fact, because the doctor is a gentleman who seems to feel a delicacy in relation to publicity in such matters, or rear the objectionable features of his own upon the public, and is a man who is not to be found in the list of quacks and pretenders, but is a gentleman of the highest attainments in his profession, and one of the most successful practitioners in the city. The doctor confines himself to such a manner as must be gratifying to all who call upon him. He is studious, silent and reserved without charge; and the patient, after hearing his opinion, is left entirely free to accept or reject his services, as he can draw further than a charge unless he is successful in effecting a cure. The doctor has the confidence which long experience has given, and the best wishes of the community for his success. Office hours from 9 A. M. to 4 P. M. and 7 to 8 P. M. Consultation free. # SAINT PATRICK'S DAY, 1873.

IN TUOLUMNE.

[Special Correspondence of THE MONITOR.]

SONORA, March 17, 1873.

The natal day of Ireland was celebrated yesterday by the Irish people of Tuolumne county in splendid style. Columbia having enjoyed the honor last year, Sonora was selected this year for the celebration. Extensive preparations had been made by the Committee of Arrangements, consisting of Thomas Leonard, Mark E. Hughes, John McCabe, Daniel Riordan and Hugh Coyle, who worked untiringly, and much of the credit attending to the success of the demonstration belongs to them. Father McNally seconded their efforts with enthusiasm, and contributed largely to the affair.

THE CELEBRATION.

At an early hour in the morning flags, streamers and banners were thrown to the breeze, and these with the music of brass bands, gave our beautiful mountain city a holiday appearance. The side walks were thronged with gaily dressed men, women and children, all "wearing the green." At half past 9 o'clock, Mr. Leonard, Marshal of the Day, formed the procession and received the James town delegation. They then proceeded to meet the Columbians, who soon appeared in full force under their Grand Marshal, Daniel Haynes. The entire procession then marched to the Catholic Church, where High Mass was performed by Rev. Father McNally, who chose the religious services with beautiful and patriotic remarks on the celebration. After this, the school children were drawn up in line, and a picture of the bright and happy little ones taken by Mr. Sewell, daguerrean artist.

The procession was re-formed, and a parade followed. The spectacle was really a fine one, the demonstration being the largest that has been seen in this county for many years, and your correspondent does not believe that any town in the state could make a more creditable display. The Columbia Hibernia Benevolent Society turned out under their worthy President, Mr. Thomas Hayes, and looked remarkably well.

THE LITERARY EXERCISES.

Turn Verein Hall was handsomely fitted up for the literary exercises, and decidedly crowded. After music by the band, the assemblage was called to order by Judge John McCabe, of Brown's Flat, President of the Day, in patriotic and appropriate remarks. The "Sidney Club song," "Wearing of the Green" with fine effect: Father McNally, by request, read an original poem, full of fire, beauty and patriotism, and Robert Ferral was introduced as the Orator of the Day. In presenting Mr. Ferral, Judge McCabe referred to his being a son of Old Tuolumne, a printer boy who was gallantly fighting his way up in the world, and the audience responded with three hearty cheers for "Bob Ferral." The warmth of his reception evidently touched Mr. Ferral, and for a time he could scarcely control his voice; but he soon recovered, and delivered an able and eloquent address. (The address will be found below.) For over an hour he enchained the close attention of his large audience, and the repeated outbursts of applause and enthusiasm during the oration, stamped the pleasure of all present. The affair wound up with a grand ball in the evening. The passed St. Patrick's Day in Tuolumne, and we say with truth, it was in every way a splendid and gratifying success.

I cannot close this hasty sketch without referring in especial manner to the large and fine display made by the Sunday School Unions of Sonora, Jamestown and Columbia. The children numbered in all about three hundred, and the banners proper to their society were six in number and presented a truly handsome appearance. These Unions were under the sole control of their Presidents and Sonder, Rev. Father McNally, who proved himself on this occasion, as in others, the earnest "apostle among the people."

Mr. Ferral's Oration.

MR. PRESIDENT, AND KIND FRIENDS: To those who know me it is unnecessary to say that I am always proud to speak for that dear old land which my sufferings and sorrows filled as echo to the hearts of her devoted children. But on this occasion, returning to the scene of my boyhood, and surrounded by my home and friends, it would be strange, indeed, if I did not feel more than ordinary pride and pleasure. Years ago, when first crossing the threshold of boyhood, I was taught to admire the St. Patrick's oration in your beautiful little mountain city; and it is no small gratification to be again the recipient of the same honor. I shall receive the assurance that I still retain the confidence, esteem and friendship of the Irish people in dear old Tuolumne.

And now, Mr. President, let us turn our attention to that little Green Isle of the ocean, whose fertility, beauty and loveliness challenge the wonder and admiration of the world. Whether in the green of its verdure, the fragrance of its flowers and the plenty of its fields, or whether ringing the harvest of its children with the choicest gifts of God. The emblem of the shamrock, with its three leaves and one stem, has but single counterpart on earth, and that is only to be found in the Emerald Isle.

"First flower of the earth and first gem of the sea!"

The harp of Erin, the oldest in the history of literature; the rude hand of the stranger has blighted the happiness of her children, but their hearts are as full to-day as the land of their birth and the faith of their fathers. Neither time nor place can dim the power of that sentiment which raises them to despair. Conscious of no offense in the sight of Heaven, they sustained themselves with faith in the justice of God, they see through their tears a brighter and better day dawning for the Emerald Isle.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

The day we celebrate brings with it a flood of time hallowed memories. Once more we meet around the altars of our country; once more we offer up at the shrine of patriotism our prayers for her deliverance; once more we assemble to pay a tribute per sate the memory of the Patron Saint of freedom, to whose mission of peace and love ascribed the sense of his labors. Every blade of grass that grows on Irish soil, every Irishman's heart throbs in response to the sun, and every little shamrock that blossom in the valleys, reminds us of the power, majesty and the work of the great Apostle. And we assemble to-night in home or abroad, to watch the burning sun of the tropics or amid the unbound regions of the far west, with a love of each and every Irish heart in. "God bless Ireland."

THE STORY OF IRISH.

The rise and fall of nations afford glowing themes for the pen of the historian, the fancy of the poet, the romance of the novelist and the eloquence of the orator. But among the long list of nations of ancient and modern, not one has given to the world so much and such a variety of subjects to engage the pen of the gifted as Ireland. The ancient Irish were a people inhabiting a country beautiful in the eye and rich in home grown natural resources which make nations wealthy, powerful and prosperous. Their form of government was an elective monarchy in their religion, the worship of the sun. Tradition in form us that even before the arrival of St. Patrick in the Irish armory, educational institutions were known among them, the use laws had been established and features of hospitality prevailed. To all of these the living Apostle gave new life, added to them a better and a more enduring frame.

THE INVASIONS AND ITS RESULT.

The advent of St. Patrick marks the beginning of the golden age of Ireland. The whole Island was converted to Christianity. Churches and school houses follow each other in his footsteps. Pagan ism disappeared, and on their hand sprung up altars for the worship of the living God. Idolatry was banished, and the people bowed as humble worshippers before the rising glories of the cross of Christ. And this grand and holy work, we must never forget, was accomplished without the sacrifice of one human life or the shedding of one drop of blood. The conversion of Ireland for useless the only instance in the history of the world of a whole people radically changing their religion without violence and bloodshed, and this fact alone speaks volumes for the hearts and minds of the old Celtic stock.

DANISH INVASIONS

During the tenth century lords after lords of fierce barbarians poured in upon Ireland, and ravaged the country with fire and sword, destroying the schools and sweeping away the monuments of learning. These piratical incursions continued for centuries, and only terminated when King Brian, sword in hand, drove the savage invaders into the sea. After their final expulsion education revived and again happiness and prosperity blessed the people.

In regard to the early civilization of Ireland, it is sufficient to say that for a long period the Green Isle was an asylum of learning for other and less favored nations. Alfred the Great received here the education which made his name and his reign illustrious. From the same fountain of learning he derived his knowledge of trial by jury, which had been long in practice under the Milesians. Bede, Camden, and several other high English authorities have left on record unquestionable testimony to the claims of the ancient Irish as a wise, educated and virtuous people. The time is that when the rest of Europe was steeped in ignorance and sunk in barbarism, Ireland was a beacon light of civilization. When the Goth and the Vandal were ravaging the Roman Empire, and civilization was well nigh disappeared from the face of the earth, the Isle of Saints held aloft the torch of knowledge and gave a warm Irish welcome to the students of other lands. And now, strange as they may seem to some ears, I presume to say, and challenge successful contradiction, that no people surpass the Irish, even at this day, in their love and admiration for learning. Under all the circumstances, they have done remarkably well in the cause of popular education. Some of the finest educational institutions in the world are to be found in Ireland at this time, while the United States afford the most remarkable and interesting proofs of the zeal and liberality of the people in this great work. In this country there are Irish colleges and academies, employing 9,000 teachers and professors, and educating 7,000 students, and in the 2,000 minor schools, with 800,000 pupils, and a good idea of the progress of learning and the revival of trade and commerce, and the prosperity and happiness of the country, may be seen in the 50 national schools attended by 402,622 children. It will be well to say that the Irish, both at home and abroad, are not far behind their neighbors in educational matters. If all this years they have made astonishing progress, and their names are prominent in the walks of learning in San Francisco, Benicia, Marysville, San José, Gilroy and Santa Cruz, together with pressing evidence in each of these places, that the sons of the mountains and valleys, show what is being done in the Golden State. In proportion as population it is exceedingly doubtful whether any other class of citizens pay a larger and more liberally for educational purposes.

ARRIVAL OF THE ENGLISH.

The blackest day in the history of Ireland was that which witnessed the arrival of Strongbow and the English adventurers in the twelfth century. This was the beginning of a long, dark night of despotism, the like of which the world has never known, and the end of which is yet to come. The accumulated horrors of British rule in Ireland make the blood recoil and the heart grow cold as death. No people since creation's dawn ever made a more heroic and determined resistance than the Irish; but British power and British gold, combined with the arch, cunning and treachery, ultimately proved too strong for human bravery.

In connection with the conquest of Ireland, we are often taunted with the dissensions which prevailed among the Irish clans and chieftains, but the argument drawn therefrom is that the people cannot live at peace among themselves, and are incapable of self-government. Now, I do not desire to represent the Celtic, at any period in their history, as my wish

THE IRISH RACE IN THE U. S.

MR. PRESIDENT, AND KIND FRIENDS:—To those who know me it is unnecessary to say that I am always proud to speak on that day of all days of gathering and reverence and fix an echo in the hearts of her devoted children. But on this occasion, return ing to the scene of my boyhood, and surrounded by old familiar faces, it would be strange, indeed, if I did not feel more than ordinary pride and pleasure. And now, Mr. President, let us turn our atten tion to that little Green Isle of the ocean, whose fertility, beauty and loveliness challenges the won der and admiration of all beholders. The bright ness of its verdure, the fragrance of its flowers and the grandeur of its scenery speak the heart of a land blessed with the choicest gifts of God. The most casual observer, as he gazes upon its shores and mark it as a spot of earth destined by the Creator for the dwelling place of a race of men and people. I need not speak its name! Do not your own hearts make answer that this is dear old Mother land?

First flower of the earth and first gem of the sea!"

The happy spirit of man has defied the power of nature; the rude hand of the stranger has blighted the happiness of its children, but true hearts are still true to the land of their birth and the faith of their fathers. Neither the sword nor the fire, the clashes of the present causes them to despair. Conscious of no offense in the sight of God, they, sustained by the unshaken faith in the justice of God, they see through their tears a brighter and better day dawning for the Emerald Isle.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY.

Once more we assemble to honor and perpetuate the memory of the Patron Saint of Ireland, whose advent of peace and love enriched the green sod of his island. And we assemble to-day at home or abroad, to speak the burning sum of the imperishable memories of the past, to speak and every Irish heart is, "God bless Ireland."

Alfred the Great received into the churches who made his home and his friends illustrious. From the same fountain of learning he derived his knowledge of trial by jury, which had been long in practice among the Milesians Brehon Laws, and several other high English authorities, have been in record unquestionable tes timony to the claims of the ancient Irish as a well educated and virtuous people. The truth is that when the rest of Europe was sleeping in ignorance and riding in barbarism, Ireland was a beacon light of civilization. When the Gaul and the Van dal were ravaging the Roman Empire, and civiliza tion well nigh disappeared from the face of the earth, the Isle of Saints held aloft the torch of knowledge and like a warm heart welcomed to the students of other lands. And now, strange as it may seem to some, the Irish people continue to say, and that history will prove the truth of the assertion. Turning to the old country, we find mysterious and rolling in Dublin, Belfast, York Galway, and Indeed, in all the principal towns and cities. In Dublin there were no less than 2,000 children in attended by 402,622 children. Thus it will be seen that the Irish, both at home and abroad, are not far behind their neighbors in this important matter. Of late years they have made astounding progress, and their numerous institutions of learning in New York, Boston, Boston, Marysville, San Jose, Gilroy and Santa Clara, together with primary schools in well nigh every State in the Union, conspicuous and valleys, show what is being done in the Golden State. In proportion to population, is a exceedingly doubtful whether any other class of citizens pay as largely and liberally for ed national purposes.

ARRIVAL OF THE ENGLISH

The blackest day in the history of Ireland was that which witnessed the arrival of Strongbow and his English adventurers in the twelfth century. This was the beginning of a long, dark night of despotism, the like of which the world has never known, and the end of which is yet to come. The accumulated horrors of British rule in Ireland must fill a blood curdle and the heart grow cold as death. No people since creation have ever made a more brave and determined resistance than the Irish, and British power, backed by British gold, combined, crush, cunning and treachery, ultimately proved to strong for human bravery.

In connection with the conquest of Ireland, we have the following lines from the Scotsman which pre vailed among the Irish clans and chieftains, and the argument drawn therefrom is that the people were of a far more amiable disposition, and are consequently less fitted for self-government. We do not desire to represent the Celtic of any period in their history as a race of non-combatants or Quakers—a mild, pliant people, but one that loved the battle fields of all nations show them to be emphatically a fighting people. As for the rest, we have given the extract as we find them here, high spirited and chivalrous, and we can only wish that the qualities which pre vailed among the Irish clans and chieftains, and the argument drawn therefrom is that the people were of a far more amiable disposition, and are consequently less fitted for self-government. ## SAINT PATRICK'S DAY, 1873.

IN VIRGINIA, NEVADA.

VIRGINIA CITY, March 18, 1873.

To the Editors of the Monitor: Thinking that an occasional something from this silver-lined region might be interesting to you, and to the readers of your worthy weekly, which is ever most gladly welcomed on this side of the Sierras, "I take my pen in hand," as the juveniles say, and make our celebration of St. Patrick's Day the subject of my letter.

The shoveling up of Sol's first golden ar-row over the snowy Humboldt range was the signal for every expectant son, daughter or lover of Erin to spring up like Jack-in-the-box and behold the clearest and most beautiful St. Patrick's Day in the morning" that has been seen for macy a 17th of March past. There was not much time for musing on the beauties of nature, however, for the sunny archer had not climbed very far up the azure heights in search of his missing darts, before the clear ringing call of the bell summoned us to our public church to assist at the ever-varying Sacrifice.

Though the Essential is always the same, one could not but fre. that the Mass was rendered even more grand by the imposing ceremonies used during the celebration. The seats of honor in the front of the church were reserved for the military, who marched up the aisles to the sound of martial music, and took their places at the command of their captain. Looking down from the gallery, which was graced by the presence of members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, a truly impressive spectacle was to be seen. In front, in grand altar grandeur, beautifully-carved ome, whereon was shed the glory of the many-colored rays from the circular window above; before the altar, our beloved and noble pastor, Very Rev. Father Manogue, offering up to heaven the spotless Lamb in honor of Ireland's apostle; and just outside the sanctuary railing, the Emmet, Sarsfield and Montgomery Guards, like a line of living glory between the people and their God.

After the Gospel, Rev. Father Nulty, our assistant pastor priest, addressed the people with most touching eloquence. His text was, "Remember the days of old; think upon every generation." He recalled to Irish hearts the happy scenes of their childhood; spoke of "the day we celebrate;" gave a brief outline of the history of St. Patrick; opposed to the unsmiling face of the world, and to the unadorned tale of her sufferings; and, pointing to the flags of America and Ireland, which waved side by side before the sanctuary, he exclaimed—"The banner of the stars and stripes floats to-day over a free and happy people, but dipped in tears is the harp of Erin!" His words were most eloquent, and when he drew, with the pencil of his own memory, the picture of the parting from home and friends, even the stern members of the military were to be seen quietly brushing the tears away. Its sentiments were caught to be true to their faith and their country, and in closing gave to all the blessing of God and St. Patrick.

But the most imposing portion of the ceremonies was the presenting of arms the whole of this moment when the Lord of Hosts came down upon the altar. It was then the sweet salute of earthly soldiers to their Heavenly General; and in the solemn silence that succeeded every bell was tolled, and a prayer at least sped skyward with the silent-rock mantled isle which had kept the faith and blessing of St. Patrick.

Mass ended, the soldiers, resuming their respective organs, marched out of the church to the inspiriting tune of "Saint Patrick's Day in the Morning," and repaired to hotel-quarters to form for

THE PROCESSION.

After some delay it commenced to move at 1 o'clock P. M., and as C. street was the principal one in its line of march, the bulk of the spectators collected there. The sidewalks were crowded and the balconies were filled with fair and gaily-dressed ladies, thronged with fair and gaily-dressed ladies, resembling so many vases filled with rain-bow-hued blossoms.

The procession moved majestically down C street, towards Gold Hill, and as the C street towards Gold Hill, and as the martial tread of the soldiers grew more and more distinct, the brass instruments waxed a glittering prelude in the sunlight, and the band struck up the beautiful melody of "The Harp that once through Tara's halls." Thus all eyes were riveted on the advancing train or regiment of soldiers. At the head rode Chief of Police Kelly and Aids. Grand Marshal James Kelly, on a gaily-caparisoned charger, gaily caparisoned, and his assistants, all with green sashes, rode directly in front of the Emmet Guard. Captain Arnold then followed the Montgomery Guard in their showy and well-uniformed company. Captain Donovan and then the Sarsfield Guard of Gold Hill.

Another brass band headed the Second Division of the procession, followed by the various Fire Companies in order, with their officers. The members presented quite a dazzling appearance, with their shining surfaces all aglow in the sunshine, and ornamented with wreaths of flowers, while the splendid old bell prevent the companies from having far to seek another.

The Third British then moved on, also headed by a Brass Band, directly behind which came the Irish Confederation, with their best foot before, each member wearing a green badge on the breast. Next in order were the members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Virginia and Gold Hill, attired in black, but relieved by the splendor of their elegant green regalia. It appeared by their elegant green regalia. It appeared by their elegant green regalia. It did one's heart good to see that large body of men, and it did not know that so many united into its ranks unless he can bring, as bowery, a perfectly painless character. The other bodies of Hibernians were magnificent, but that of Division No. 1, of Virginia, was superb both in richness of material and splendour of design. The heavy silk and gold banner of green, edged with was of a most beautiful green, edged with gold braid. On the side first seen as the received much merited applause.

Father cattus's Oration.

The oration of the day, by Rev. Father J. J. Cattus, was the feature of the entertainment of the Theater. When introduced by President Harney, he was greeted with applause. He said:—Ireland's national holiday has returned to the Irish people, and it has been celebrated with all its pleasant associations. Of all the great festivities none was greater or dearer to the Irish than this. It was a mistaken idea to suppose that we celebrate the day as the Americans did the 22d of February, for then they celebrated the birthday of their idol; but we celebrate the day when a pure spirit was given up to our God, and at the same time celebrating the victory of our faith." He referred to the (what he called) unpleasant task of Order of the Day, owing to fact of his having to travel over the same ground that so many "abler minds" had been before. They might as well try to improve the writings of Shakespeare, of Milton, or Tom Moore, the non-pareil, of Milton, or Tom Moore, the non-pareil, as to add a little to Connemara, or the Immortal Father Burke. He said: Why do we as many representatives of Ireland here? Why have you traveled so far from your native land, your home? Have you dropped your harrows, your plows and other implements of agriculture? Why, to celebrate the day of the death of the patron saint of our country. Other nations had reserved the days of their sovereigns, but Ireland's is one to shine steadfastly then Ireland." He spoke proudly of the Sons of Ireland, scattered, ago, had emerged from the darkness of Paganism, "a nation that is the angle of God's right hand." He referred to the adherence to that faith had ever been a distinguishing character of the Irish people. He said: May she continue in the future what she has been in the past, the guardian of God's treat to His people, the defender of the rights of man. May the chancrook ever adorn the bosom of her mitred head, and the green sash and shillelagh, upon the warm bosoms of her daughters, the purse, prettiest and most charming of women." He referred at length to the early Christian age, and he felt proud that that faith was still preserved in the land of his sires in all its primitive freshness. Ireland was the only European nation at the time that had escaped the ravages of the Danish barbarians, and then, afterward, after three hundred years of bloody persecution, she arose, and struggled upward and onward," and never gave up until the victory was won. He then referred to the

IRELAND AND THE PAPACY.

We hear it often urged by Irish nationalists, who have practically if not avowedly thrown off their allegiance to Catholicity, that what they call the "political Papacy" is now and always has been hostile towards Ireland. By this they mean, if they mean anything at all, that the influence of the Catholic Church, exercised through the agency of its visible head on earth, has been used to support the English usurpation and keep our people in a state of bondage and servitude. How any one conversant with the history of Ireland can honestly hold opinions like these is to us an inscrutable riddle; but, unfortunately, we have not far or long to seek in order to find ample demonstration of the fact that these opinions are, at all events, expressed. Whether they are held honestly and conscientiously, or otherwise, of course is a matter open to judge.

These self-styled nationalists declare that from 1172, when the Normans first landed, up to the time of the denial of Papal supremacy by HENRY VIII., and the virtual establishment of Protestantism, the Popes were in favor of the invaders, and opposed every attempt of the people to regain their independence. Then they tell us that from the date of the Reformation until the latter part of the last century the Sovereign Pontiffs pursued the reverse policy, and were anxious to see the English ascendancy established. Finally, they assure us that from 1790, or thereabouts, to the present day the Popes have used their first line of conduct—supported the invaders and discouraged the people from making any attempt to recover independence. Thus they divide the history of Ireland into three epochs, in all of which the policy of the Papacy was either totally wrong or right through improper or interested motives. It is hard, indeed, to see the expediency of raising such issues now, when their decision, one way or another, can be followed by no good practical results; and we are forced, however unwillingly, to the conclusion that the individuals who advance these arguments do so for a bad purpose, and with the intention of weakening the bonds of love and affection which link Ireland to the Holy See. It is by no means difficult to reveal the fallacies that underlie the assertions of the anti-Catholic writers, for they are based upon palpable misconceptions of the facts of history. We shewed conclusively, for instance, we hope, last week, that the Bull of ADRIAN, allowing his authenticity to go unquestioned, had nothing to do with the invasion of Ireland, and had no effect whatever upon the progress of that great outrage upon freedom.

Now, when the Normans had overrun the island and occupied its chief strategic points in a way that showed they aimed at permanent occupation—a thing never contemplated by the Bull, as exhibited by themselves, which only spoke of an interference for the establishment of order—what could the Popes do? It would have been useless for them to insist upon the invaders returning, which, doubtless, would have been done had they been aware of the manner in which the conquest had been effected. Knew the treatment inflicted upon the people; because the plunderers too well appreciated the richness of the spoils they had secured. Again, there was never any protest made on behalf of the Irish people, as a whole, inasmuch as every complaint uttered came from some petty princes, who may or may not have been in the wrong himself. Consequently, the Sovereign Pontiffs were justified in assuming that the Normans were in the country with the consent of at least part of its inhabitants.

However humiliating it may be for us, it is wrong to deny the patent fact that for a long time we have themselves chiefly to blame for the conquest and its disastrous results. Had they been united, had they been under they rule of one monarch, who could lawfully say out to the Arbiter of Christendom, "our dominions are wrongfully invaded," the Normans would either never have landed at all or their possession of Irish soil would have been only a temporary one. But a country where petty kings and princelings were quarreling with one another, could bring forward no reason why the sovereign of another nation should not espouse the cause of him whom they believed to be in the right and support him against his adversaries. According to the laws which governed the mutual relations of nations at that time, the Popes had no grounds for insisting upon the return of the Normans into England. They did all they were able to do—they insisted upon a mitigation of the horrors of war, and demanded that mercy be shown to the suffering people. At no period did any one of the Popes express approbation of English rule in Ireland, though, for the purposes of Church government and for the maintenance of ecclesiastical relations with the people, they were necessitated to render it a certain degree of recognition.

The alleged change of policy from the time of the Reformation is readily explained, and it requires a singular perversion of feeling to make it the groundwork of a reproach against the Papacy. The efforts made to force Protestantism upon the Irish, and to make them forego the faith of their forefathers, were so relentless and so cruel that, if the English rule were the most legitimate the world ever saw, they completely absolved the people from all allegiance, and justified them in resorting to insurrection in order to escape from persecution. And it was a chivalrous and a generous thing of the Popes to aid as they did with money and arms, though surrounded themselves with difficulties, a nation struggling for freedom. It is easy, indeed, to attribute motives of self-interest, and the noblest deeds emblazoned on the history of mankind may be similarly explained away by petty detractors; but, thank Heaven, there is yet chivalry enough among us to recognize real merit and bestow upon it its due award of praise. So, in spite of all the insinuations and innuendoes of self-distant patriots, the Irish will ever remain grateful to the Sovereign Pontiffs for what they have done to promote their temporal as well as their spiritual welfare.

The last part of the accusation, that which declares the existence of a collusion between the Papacy and the British Government, with the object of repressing Irish discontent, is the most absurd fiction of all. The grievance-mongers of whom we are speaking maintain that in every election to the episcopacy which has taken place in Ireland since 1850 the choice of the people, as expressed by the votes of the parish priests, has been set aside, and pliable whose principles were acceptable to the British Ministry have been appointed. This is tantamount to saying that Queen VICTORIA could have been consulted with respect to the election of bishops to vacant Irish sees, and that their judgment has had a preponderating influence. The assertion is so monstrous, so opposed to possibility on the very face of it, that to put it down in writing is to pen its refutation. Ever since 1850, and long before that, the English Government has been one of the bitterest and most active enemies of the Papacy. British statesmen and British journalists of every rank and grade thought it not below them to hound on the infidel revolutionists who were plotting the destruction of the Pope's temporal sovereignty. There was not an intrigue or conspiracy set on foot against the Sovereign Pontiff or against the peace of Catholicity by the agents of MAZZINI, GARIBALDI and the secret societies of which they were chiefs, that was not sustained by British gold. Every man who has attained or pressed the meridian of life can call to mind the fiendish diatribes of the Times and other organs of English opinion against Papal rule in Rome, and the eager way in which they called on the scum of revolutionary Europe to drive the venerated successor of St. PETER from the Vatican—actually hinting, too, that if the "old priest" life were lost, no great harm would be done. Nonetheless all this while the base and bigotry, the anti-religious "patriots" would have us believe that there was an excellent understanding between Rome and London, and that both were leagued together in the keeping of Ireland in slavery. And they cite the selection of Irish bishops as proof thereof, although it is perfectly impossible for them to fathom the reason for election or rejection in these cases, or even, indeed, form an intelligent guess at them. But in their fanatical anxiety to injure the fame of the Pope and to decry Catholicity, they will not hesitate to attribute motives, and these of a highly discreditable nature. What a degree of malice and adroitness do we not find in this conduct!

WHATS IN A NAME?

MR. WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, of happy memory, was, during his mortal life, of opinion that there was not very much in a name, one way or another. But the experience of mankind since the days of the great dramatist goes to show that he was altogether correct, and that occasionally, at all events, there may be a great deal involved in a name. Certainly a rose called by any other name would smell just as sweet—there we cheerfully give in our adhesion to that illustrious playwright; but the odor of a human being may be considerably influenced for better or worse by his appellative. For instance, the surname of "MURPHY" has been a most decided favor of "papistry" hanging about it; while that of "ANTISELL," naturally, suggests LUTHER or the Thirty-nine Articles. We do not know anything more unconnected for a staunch Protestant to carry about with him through this unsympathizing world than the name of "MURPHY." It is sure to fit him clumsily, like a suit of second-hand clothes and that perhaps his ancestors, because he imagines everybody is thinking either that his appellation ought not to be MURPHY, or else that he ought not to be a Protestant. In fact, the thing is painfully suggestive of a fraud somewhere.

A curious advertisement appearing in the Oakland Home Journal of Saturday, March 22d, has set us musing over this interesting subject. In that advertisement a certain THOMAS J. MURPHY, "born in Ireland, in the Kingdom of Great Britain," but now residing "in the city of Oakland, in the county of Alameda and State of California," prays an order of the County Court of Alameda changing his name from THOMAS J. MURPHY to THOMAS MURPHY ANTISELL, and the application is actually dated on St. PATRICK'S Day! The reasons he gives for preferring his little request are rather singular. Three years after his father had gone the way of all flesh, his mother married a man named ANTISELL, by whom she had several children. When THOMAS J. grew up and went into business for himself he thought the ancient Hibernian cognomen good enough. But some time ago ANTISELL was gathered to his fathers, and T. J.'s mamma was left a widow for the second time. The old lady, although she has a son called after the second husband, is anxious that THOMAS, her first-born, shall also become an ANTISELL, and cease to be a MURPHY. We cannot find words to express our admiration for the filial respect and obedience evinced by THOMAS J. in his anxiety to procure the fulfillment of her wish, and we will think it very hard of the County Court of Alameda if it refuses to comply with his pious prayer.

But we cannot help wondering, at the same time, how it happened that so long as he was a poor man and an honest one—when, for example, he was engaged in the lucrative business of soliciting subscribers for THE MONITOR—THOMAS J. was not ashamed to bear the name of his father. It is only since he went to White Pine and made a fortune, and since he became a "shining light" in one of Oakland's aristocratic Protestant churches, and since he became a magnate among the "free and accepted," that he has, according to the information we have received, found it unpleasant and inconvenient to be called "Mr. MURPHY." We acknowledge it is a queer name to go to church with, and we can very well understand his wish to get rid of it. We have only a very small interest in the man, yet we would prefer that he should cease to be hailed by that fine old Irish appellative; and the County Court of Alameda, will oblige us by turning him, right away, into AN ANTISELL, or any other sort of a "sell" that may please him.

UNJUST CENSURES.

The shallowness and self-sufficiency of the newspaper criticism of our day almost surpass description. The "journalist" of this country is, in nineteen cases out of twenty, a man of little information and small acquaintance with literature, either ancient or modern. Of science he knows hardly anything, and of theology he is utterly ignorant, and of logic he has not the faintest conception. He can, however, write silky-slop English, spell words of four syllables with the aid of a dictionary, is naturally well versed in partisan politics; and so he feels authorized to set himself up as a director of public opinion, as an expounder of morals and as a critic of all things terrestrial. There is no creature inhabiting this earth so unblushingly audacious, so insufferably arrogant, so immovable in stolidity, as your genuine "Bohemian." He will calmly pass judgment upon the greatest work of art, upon the loftiest flight of genius, upon the most recondite truths of science, and imperiously demand that all classes of society shall accept his pronouncement. In fact, there is nothing in the heavens above or on the earth below concerning which he does not feel himself thoroughly competent to give an opinion.

It is perfectly impossible to estimate the amount of mischief he does by perpetuating error, by creating misapprehensions and by impeding the advance of truth. In America, particularly, where really well-informed men are few, and where the newspaper is looked upon as a sort of oracle by the masses, his power for effecting evil is enormous. The Catholic Church in an especial degree suffers from his prejudice and his ignorant self-sufficiency. He doctrines, his practice, his policy, are matters upon which he is exceedingly fond of expatiating, of course in a highly denunciatory style, although he has never taken the least pains to study them and is consequently utterly ignorant of their merits. An article in last Monday's Chronicle, dealing with the relations existing between the Carlists in Spain and the Holy See, is as goodan illustration of this kind of arrogant assertion as we should care to cite. The writer of it found in the Independence Belge, or probably found translated somewhere from that journal, a document purporting to be a letter addressed by Cardinal ANTONELLI to the Spanish Bishops. This letter contained a notice to the hierarchy that they were to order the priests to rouse the people to insurrection in favor of Don CARLOS—who is King of Spain by "divine right," and is a staunch Catholic, ardently attached to the interests of his Church—and thus overthrow the republic recently established. Now, the writer in the Chronicle, without going to the trouble to investigate its authenticity—without even making inquiry as to whether it was in accordance with the principles of our country—pounds a long and very onslaught against the political tendencies of Catholicity, arguing that if it is opposed to republicanism in Europe, it must also be opposed to that system of government in this country, and therefore it ought to be watched as being dangerous to the community, etc. Only for this letter the Chronicle would graciously treat the case of the Cure of Santa Cruz—who looks one of the most powerful of the Carlist bands, and who has been accused of shooting his prisoners—as an isolated instance of ardent but misguided patriotism. Now, however, after the perusal of the supercilionary decurrent from the pen of Cardinal ANTONELLI, it is impelled to look upon the conduct of this soldier-priest as part and parcel of the policy of the Vatican. Of course this "fly paper" cannot but see in these circumstance a proof of the determination of the Pope and the Cardinals to interfere in the domestic affairs of independent nations. And then comes the horrible though—What if the Pope and Cardinal ANTONELLI, and all the other magnates of the Catholic Church, were to take sides in the same manner as the sway of the political factions here and command their adherents to enkindle another civil war!

Our contemporary is quite needlessly alarmed. If there never is another civil war in the United States until the Pope creates one, the country may confidently look forward to the longest period of interior tranquility recorded of any nation figuring in the world's history. Now, with respect to the letter which has been made the foundation for these alarmist theories—we have little hesitation in declaring it to be a forgery, an infamous concoction, the work of some very unprincipled, but very imprudent enemy of the Church. If Cardinal ANTONELLI ever wrote such a letter, or any member of the Spanish hierarchy received it, we should surely have heard of it before now in some one of the Catholic journals. And in the columns of the Spanish press is, we imagine, the place where any intelligent person would expect to find it published first. Certainly, not many people would fancy that a Belgian free-thinking print could be the medium for giving it publicity. This circumstance is of itself quite sufficient to cast doubt upon the authenticity of the letter and schindle suspicion for THE MONITOR—THOMAS J. was not ashamed to bear the name of his father. It is only since he went to White Pine and made a fortune, and since he became a "shining light" in one of Oakland's aristocratic Protestant churches, and since he became a magnate among the "free and accepted," that he has, according to the information we have received, found it unpleasant and inconvenient to be called "Mr. MURPHY." We acknowledge it is a queer name to go to church with, and we can very well understand his wish to get rid of it. We have only a very small interest in the man, yet we would prefer that he should cease to be hailed by that fine old Irish appellative; and the County Court of Alameda, will oblige us by turning him, right away, into AN ANTISELL, or any other sort of a "sell" that may please him.

UNJUST CENSURES.

The shallowness and self-sufficiency of the newspaper criticism of our day almost surpass description. The "journalist" of this country is, in nineteen cases out of twenty, a man of little information and small acquaintance with literature, either ancient or modern. Of science he knows hardly anything, and of theology he is utterly ignorant, and of logic he has not the faintest conception. He can, however, write silky-slop English, spell words of four syllables with the aid of a dictionary, is naturally well versed in partisan politics; and so he feels authorized to set himself up as a director of public opinion, as an expounder of morals and as a critic of all things terrestrial. There is no creature inhabiting this earth so unblushingly audacious, so insufferably arrogant, so immovable in stolidity, as your genuine "Bohemian." He will calmly pass judgment upon the greatest work of art, upon the loftiest flight of genius, upon the most recondite truths of science, and imperiously demand that all classes of society shall accept his pronouncement. In fact, there is nothing in the heavens above or on the earth below concerning which he does not feel himself thoroughly competent to give an opinion.

It is perfectly impossible to estimate the amount of mischief he does by perpetuating error, by creating misapprehensions and by impeding the advance of truth. In America, particularly, where really well-informed men are few, and where the newspaper is looked upon as a sort of oracle by the masses, his power for effecting evil is enormous. The Catholic Church in an especial degree suffers from his prejudice and his ignorant self-sufficiency. He doctrines, his practice, his policy, are matters upon which he is exceedingly fond of expatiating, of course in a highly denunciatory style, although he has never taken the least pains to study them and is consequently utterly ignorant of their merits. An article in last Monday's Chronicle, dealing with the relations existing between the Carlists in Spain and the Holy See, is as goodan illustration of this kind of arrogant assertion as we should care to cite. The writer of it found in the Independence Belge, or probably found translated somewhere from that journal, a document purporting to be a letter addressed by Cardinal ANTONELLI to the Spanish Bishops. This letter contained a notice to the hierarchy that they were to order the priests to rouse the people to insurrection in favor of Don CARLOS—who is King of Spain by "divine right," and is a staunch Catholic, ardently attached to the interests of his Church—and thus overthrow the republic recently established. Now, the writer in the Chronicle, without going to the trouble to investigate its authenticity—without even making inquiry as to whether it was in accordance with the principles of our country—pounds a long and very onslaught against the political tendencies of Catholicity, arguing that if it is opposed to republicanism in Europe, it must also be opposed to that system of government in this country, and therefore it ought to be watched as being dangerous to the community, etc. Only for this letter the Chronicle would graciously treat the case of the Cure of Santa Cruz—who looks one of the most powerful of the Carlist bands, and who has been accused of shooting his prisoners—as an isolated instance of ardent but misguided patriotism. Now, however, after the perusal of the supercilionary decurrent from the pen of Cardinal ANTONELLI, it is impelled to look upon the conduct of this soldier-priest as part and parcel of the policy of the Vatican. Of course this "fly paper" cannot but see in these circumstance a proof of the determination of the Pope and the Cardinals to interfere in the domestic affairs of independent nations. And then comes the horrible though—What if the Pope and Cardinal ANTONELLI, and all the other magnates of the Catholic Church, were to take sides in the same manner as the sway of the political factions here and command their adherents to enkindle another civil war!

Our contemporary is quite needlessly alarmed. If there never is another civil war in the United States until the Pope creates one, the country may confidently look forward to the longest period of interior tranquility recorded of any nation figuring in the world's history. Now, with respect to the letter which has been made the foundation for these alarmist theories—we have little hesitation in declaring it to be a forgery, an infamous concoction, the work of some very unprincipled, but very imprudent enemy of the

DEATH OF VERY REV. DR. CROKE V. G., P. P., CHARLEVILLE.

In our news columnsto-day will be found a paragraph taken from the Cork Examiner of February 24th, announcing the death of the Very Rev. Dr. CROKE, Vicar-General and Parish Priest of Charleville, county Cork, Ireland. The death of such a man demands something more than a mere passing notice at the hands of Irish journalists, no matter in what part of the world they may be located, for he was in every respect a noble representative of the priesthood of Ireland.

Sprung from an old and honorable family, always remarkable for its devotion to the Church, as well as for its staunch and unflinching patriotism, it was almost natural for Dr. CROKE to be blessed with a religious vocation. More than the lifetime of a generation has passed away since he was ordained a priest and empowered to preach the gospel to his countrymen. It was in 1811, long before the glorious era of Catholic Emancipation, when the Liberator was a poor, struggling barrister all unknown to fame. Of course the young priest felt acutely the humiliation of his co-religionists and longed to see them freed from the galling pressure of the penal laws. So he became a member of the famous Catholic Association—the organization which supported and sustained O'CONNELL in his seemingly unequal contest with prejudice and intolerance—proving himself indefatigable in its service, and manifesting the vigor and fearlessness which throughout a long life remained his chief characteristics.

When Catholic Emancipation was gained, Doctor CROKE did not think, like so many others, that complete justice had been won for Ireland, and that he might, without reproach of conscience, confine himself to the strict routine of his priestly duties. He was a patriot as well as a priest, and next to the disabilities that affected his creed, he felt bitterly the servitude that degraded his country. He joined the Repeal Association and accompanied the Liberator, of whom he was an ardent admirer and limitless friend, to most of the monster meetings wherein the sentiment of the people in favor of legislative independence was so powerfully evoked. He communicated his own spirit of enthusiasm to his parishioners of Charleville, and throughout the whole agitation they were among the most staunchest adherents of O'CONNELL and the most liberal contributors to the Repeal Fund.

Even after the movement for freedom had collapsed, after the Liberator had died of a broken heart, and when the terrible famine seemed to have forever destroyed the strength of Ireland, Dr. CROKE did not despair of his country, but still hoped for success. From his bold and almost defiant advocacy of her rights, one would imagine that he held belief in her resurrection from the grave of her misery. He was like Father of Tuam, whom he much resembled in character, and with whom he was always in sympathy, he refused to accept as final any settlement of the "Irish question" which did not include the concession of the inestimable boon of independence.

Time flew by, and Dr. CROKE's years far outnumbered the three score and ten allotted to man; but age could not diminish his zeal for God's Church or his love for Ireland. He grew old, and was gathered to the assistance of this in November, 1868, when a wretched creature named SAUNDERS, a magistrate in Charleville, learning from placards posted through the town that Dr. CROKE was about to celebrate an anniversary Mass celebrated in the church for the repose of the souls of ALLEN, LARKIN and O'BRIEN, the Manchester martyrs, had the audacity to write a letter to the Bishop demanding an explanation, and asking that the offering of the Holy Sacrifice for such an "illegal" purpose be prohibited. This outrage aroused the spirit of the venerable priest—he was then drawing near to eighty years of age—and he replied to MR. SAUNDERS in a manner that must have made that worthy and legal functionary feel extremely uncomfortable. He said that he was ashamed to be a Catholic; that he regretted was that ill-health prevented him from celebrating it himself, and that MR. SAUNDERS was perfectly welcome to stop it if he dared. We need hardly say that MR. SAUNDERS thought better of trying conclusions with the men of Charleville, and that the Mass for the murdered patriots was duly said.

Dr. CROKE was a very accomplished scholar and could write with much neatness and vigor; but he was rather averse to figuring in print, and unless on great occasions seldom indulged in public controversies. His pride was to faithfully perform his duties as a priest and to lovingly watch over the interests of the flock entrusted to his care. For forty-six years he was parish priest of Charleville, and it is no meaning phrase rhetoric to say that he had endeared himself to young and old and was highly respected by men of all creeds. He passed away full of years, at the patriarchal age of ninety, to receive the exceeding great reward which God Almighty reserves for the good and faithful servant. He was, indeed, a representative Irish priest—one of those grand and massive characters endowed with high integrity and vast intellectual power; one of those God-made heroes who never cringe to oppression because it is strong, or ignore suffering because it is humble. May his sleep be with the blessed—in glory everlasting!

Dr. CROKE was uncle to the Very Rev. JAMES CROKE, the Vicar-General of this Archdiocese, also to the Most Rev. THOMAS CROKE, Bishop of Auckland, New Zealand, who won such golden opinions during his brief stay in this city two years ago. Those Very Reverend gentlemen are not, however, the only members of the family vowed to the service of God. There are also Sister MARY JOSEPH CROKE, of the Convent of Mercy, Charleville, county Cork, and Sister MARY IGNATIUS CROKE, of the Convent of Mercy, Bathurst, New South Wales, Australia, who are nieces of the deceased.

Our latest Irish files simply record the death of Dr. CROKE and speak of his many sterling qualities as a priest and an Irishman. When we receive an account of his obsequies, as most likely we shall during the course of the ensuing week, we shall transfer it to our columns without any abbreviation.

THE MURDER OF MATTHEW TARPEY.

Now that the body of MATTHEW TARPEY, put to death in open day, without a shadow of justification, by an armed mob, is laid in the grave, the question naturally arises—Will any steps be taken to secure the punishment of his murderers? The laws of the land have been flagrantly set at defiance, a building for the safe-keeping of criminals and those amenable to justice has been forcibly broken into, a citizen, accused of a serious offense, it is true, but whose guilt or innocence had yet to be decided by a legal tribunal, has been taken therefrom and put to an ignominious death by unauthorized and irresponsible parties—what is the Government going to do about it? The perpetrators of the murder, the men who deliberately set themselves above the law, are well known, and do not even make an effort to hide their participation in the crime. Some of them actually make open boast of it, and certain that they have exacted "retribution" from one who otherwise would have gone unwhipped of justice. If these men are allowed to go free, and if no endeavor is made to call them to account for what they have done, then we may as well strike the name of the United States from the list of civilized nations, and abolish our courts of justice as useless institutions.

We understand that it is believe no one will be bold enough to contradict us, that, had the tragedy of Monterey been enacted in any other country in the world excepting in a country with a ready flow of good legal government, or, ere this much lauded republic, every man concerned in the hanging of MATTHEW TARPEY would ere this have been arrested, and be in a fair way for trial for the committal of the highest crimes known to the statute book. And if the criminals were either numerous enough or influential enough to defy the local authorities, as is the case in Virginia City, horse, foot and artillery, would, if necessary, be hurried to the spot to maintain the supremacy of law and put an end to mobocracy. Consequently, however, whether any attempt will ever be made to trouble the tranquillity of the "Vigilantes" of Salinas, Monterey or Watsonville, WHY Rumor our boasted Government is altogether in a position to express an opinion," and its high-est authority is founded upon the whims and caprices of the day. It has no strength as opposed to "public sentiment," and so long as the latter remains unformed by the Watchmanpitomizes to get rid of bad Irish neighbors is to help in the Home Rule movement. When Home Rule becomes established in Ireland and Ireland is no longer connected with Great Britain, as a constitutional fact, then that assemblage will be more troublesome than it is now, and will clear out very rapidly.

WHAT WOULD THEY SAY?

Very many persons, personally respectable and respected, are occupying a good position in life, and are entitled to have the term applied to the districts where they are simply laborers and perform work which the others consider too exhausting and toilsome; but these districts where they are artisans and skilled operatives.

The Woverhampton rioters seem to have gone a little further than the rest of their brethren, and to have declared war against the Irish for daring to work in England at all! Now, for our part, we freely acknowledge that it is somewhat of agrievance for us men of the town just named to see Irishmen, who have been fairly educated and have a good number million on hand, and who are in the receipt of a handsome income, compelled to work for their daily bread, and to be forcibly broken into, a citizen, accused of a serious offense, it is true, but whose guilt or innocence had yet to be decided by a legal tribunal, has been taken therefrom and put to an ignominious death by unauthorized and irresponsible parties—what is the Government going to do about it? THE REBELLION OF

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART THIRD.

For a full minute after the fulmination of the curse, Sir John Talbot stood in motionless dismay; the bells knelling in his brain and the people's footsteps, as they swept past him, sounding in his ears like the noise of flowing waters. He felt as if the ground on which he stood was moving with the moving multitude; every eye seemed turned upon him, and every hand outstretched for his destruction. Alas, there were no eyes bent on him save those of his unhappy bride; no hands, save hers, about him; for his miserable kinswoman had fled the stall in horror, and her brother was also withdrawn from the band of contestants in the chancel; but Ellen was still by his side, still clasping his hands, and still gazing on him with looks, amid all their anguish, of confidence and affection. But as her eyes dwelt on his countenance, so ghastly and despairing as for a moment it was, the dreadful thought—that he was guilty—came upon her heart like the stroke of death; she sickened, and tottered back, all pale as ashes. The hands of the wretched knight fell like lead when they lost their support in hers, but the sudden motion of their withdrawal started him from his trance; he drew a hard breath—almost a sob—raised his hand hurriedly to his forehead, and looked around. His first impulse was to put his arm again round his bride's waist, and he did so with all the quickness of affectionate care, never once dreamt of the suspicion on her mind; his looks were those of an indignant but awfully distressed man. "I am innocent! I will not endure it!" he cried; "Ellen dear, this was a horrid scene to bring you to!"

The relieved assertion of his innocence became like new life to his fainting bride, yet she still gasped from the agony of her first fearful apprehension, as she faintly articulated, "I can bear it—I could have born it all, but, when I saw you look so, I had a horrible thought—John, dearest, I think so no longer!"

"Ah, gracious God!" he cried, the cause of her sudden terror at once revealing itself; "Ellen, love, if you doubted me, I were lost forever! I never did it!—I would have sold you all, if I had but one minute's opportunity before our marriage; but this same upon me so suddenly, that my very heart is struck down in my breast. Ah! I have scorned the Church too much; I have been a fearful reviler of holy men!"

"Keep up your heart, love," she replied; "God is merciful; prayer and penance may yet appease the Church. I will fast with you—I will pray with you. Oh, I could kneel down and thank heaven that it is no worse!"

"Bad enough, Ellen—bad enough!" he answered bitterly; "but I do thank Heaven that has given me such a comforter; yet, blessed Virgin! what could this innocent girl have done to make her partner in such a punishment?"

"I can bear it—I can bear it all," said Ellen; "the burthen of it all is light compared with a moment's such belief as wrung my heart before you spoke as you did."

"Bless you, my good angel; bless you!—but, Ellen love, you know little of me, if you have to bear; we must prepare for the worst—they will be coming presently to arrest me."

"Dearest, no! Your dress disguises you; if your kinsman be true to you, we are safe still."

"Noble girl! you make me ashamed of my faintheartedness; you have twice my spirit in you, I do truly believe; and you play falsely by me—but why should I shun them? I am an innocent man, and by the bright heaven, I will not endure it! I will go to the prioress! I will make my appeal to Cromer himself!"

There was a sudden tenderness of animation in Ellen's voice, and her cheek kindled again as she replied: "Dear John, I would rather hear that word than the sweetest vow you ever made me! Yes, to the foot of St. Peter's chair! I will go barefoot with you on all that holly errand! Come away, love; the world is all before us, and we'll never again walk the world for your sake now, than sit by your side in Desart Castle the happiest day I ever knew you before!" She drew her mantle round her with a firm hand as she spoke, and Talbot, his spirit half fired by a word of answer, though the pressure of his hand told well how warmly his soul responded, led her with a firm step, almost an slate step, to the door. Just in the narrow passage, Father Keating met them, face to face: Damp Margaret was with him, pale shuddering, the image of consternation.

"Wretched man," cried the ecclesiastic, "dost thou still pollute the house of God with thy accursed presence?"

"Master Keating," said Talbot, firmly, "God's house cannot receive pollution from the presence of an innocent man. I have not harmed a hair of Archbishop Alan's head! I tell you, Father Thomas, and by the staff of the blessed Patrick, I swear it, to your teeth!"

"Blaspheme not, blaspheme not!" exclaimed Keating; "I am a stranger to thy grievous sin by yielding to my sister's solicitations that I would suffer the escape of such a wretch;"

"I seek no escape!" cried the knight; "I am an innocent man, and I claim the trial, —combat—by ordeal—for I am not what my fortune is firm in the God of justice!"

"Alas," replied Keating, "what idle words are these? Thou are now wrapped in the bonds of excommunication; thy soul is this day sunk in perdition forever!"

"Master Keating," said Talbot solemnly, and not without a shudder, "if days and by you a falsehood under this roof; I would to God I could show you my heart; you would find there sorrow enough for many a fault, and many a sinful folly, but, to the core, it is clear of malice towards the murdered man! look at these hands—may the palsy strike them if they have shed one drop of of his blood! Master Keating, I am innocent of Archbishop Alan's murder, so help me God and the blessed Patrick!"

"His never did it," retorted Ellen, "and you cannot, oh! you cannot believe that we dare lift up an untruth in this holy place! Hear us, reverend Father, help us; we are willing to submit ourselves to the Church's judgment; there is no penance to hard for dear dear Father, all us, and your soul shall never want the prayers of two grateful beings who have none else on earth to look up for justice and protection but yourself and this kind lady. Ah, Mistress Margaret (to the kinswoman) you can't influence your brother —aid us with him a little further—all we ask is to procure a safe appeal to the pontiff."

"Alas, unhappy young gentlewoman," said Father Keating, before his sister, who was now weeping bitterly, could make any reply, "you have forgotten, you have indeed forgotten yourself; from my soul I pity you, and fervently pray the Mother of the afflicted to sustain you; but, alas, alas, my child, you have now no part in this wretched man—you are not his wife!"

"What mean you, sir," said Ellen, with flashing eyes and face and bosom of crimson; "the words that made me sore scarce yet cold upon your own lips."

"Who dares to say that this lady is not my wife!" demanded Talbot in the same breath, but in a tone of fierce impatience, contrasting strongly with Ellen's low but indignant expostulation.

"May God pity you both!" cried the churchman, the tears, in spite of all his efforts, rising to his eyes—"when I joined your hands this morning I never thought to have to tell you such a tale; but I must not conceal the truth from either of you; unhappy man, would to heaven I could believe you innocent!"

"I am innocent! What of my wife, sir!" demanded Talbot fiercely.

"Miserable man," replied Keating, kindling at his questioner's warmth, "she is no wife of thine! The sentence that has wrapped thy soul in the bonds of excommunication has bound all others—thy marriage is not void! It is your condemnation of an innocent man that is void and ineffectual! Ellen, my bride, my own beloved wife, come with me; let them call us what they will; you are mine now in the sight of God—you are mine, Ellen, and I am yours till death parts us."

"Daughter," said the churchman, "this is the voice of the temptress! If you listen you are lost! I tell you plainly your marriage is a mockery, a blasphemy, and I charge almost a sob—raised his hand hurriedly to his forehead, and looked around. His first impulse was to put his arm again round his bride's waist, and he did so with all the quickness of affectionate care, never once dreamt of the suspicion on her mind; his looks were those of an indignant but awfully distressed man. With these mournful imaginations gathering darkly over the one spark of pride still living in his heart, he was leading Ellen forth in silence, when he felt some twitch his mantle, and turning, found Dame Keating by his side. She was pressing and blessing herself after the pollution of his touch, but her face too plainly beckoned the sorrow and commiseration that were already prevailing at her heart, to leave any room for anger at this acknowledgment of her doubtful abhorrance. "May the blessed Virgin pardon me," she whispered, "if I have touched the wretch! but the last to forgive any injury was ever I, and I cannot but see that you are sorely distressed; Ellen is my own sister's child—and dearly I love her—and I am yours till death parts us."

"Daughter," said the churchman, "this is the voice of the temptress! If you listen you are lost! I tell you plainly your marriage is a mockery, a blasphemy, and I charge you as the Ordinary and legate of this realm, that you hold no intercourse with this excommunicated man, on pain of the greater excommunication! Come away, love; the world is all before us, and we'll never again walk the world for your sake now, than sit by your side in Desart Castle the happiest day I ever knew you before!" She drew her mantle round her with a firm hand as she spoke, and Talbot, his spirit half fired by a word of answer, though the pressure of his hand told well how warmly his soul responded, led her with a firm step, almost an slate step, to the door. Hear us, reverend Father, help us; we are willing to submit ourselves to the Church's judgment; there is no penance to hard for dear dear Father, all us, and your soul shall never want the prayers of two grateful beings who have none else on earth to look up for justice and protection but yourself and this kind lady. Ah, Mistress Margaret (to the kinswoman) you can't influence your brother —aid us with him a little further—all we ask is to procure a safe appeal to the pontiff."

"Alas, unhappy young gentlewoman," said Father Keating, before his sister, who was now weeping bitterly, could make any reply, "you have forgotten, you have indeed forgotten yourself; from my soul I pity you, and fervently pray the Mother of the afflicted to sustain you; but, alas, alas, my child, you have now no part in this wretched man—you are not his wife!"

Bishop Dupanloup and Marshal MacMahon.

From a book entitled "Men of the Third Republic," recently published in London and written by an author with strong Republican sympathies, we take the following sketches of Marshal MacMahon and Bishop Dupanloup. They will be found very interesting:

Marie-Edme-Patrice-Maurice de MacMahon was born at Sully, near Autun, in the department of Saone-et-Loire, on the 13th of July, 1808. He descended from an ancient family of Irish Catholics who joined the fortunes of the Stuarts, and took refuge in Burgundy. His father was the first Duke of Magenta, and also the first Marshal, and whose him the way to high. He first finished his sword and his cloak in the service of Charles X., and went to the camp to demand Actard at the head of the Second

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

PAUL MORPHY, the celebrated chessman, is quite poor in New Orleans. He appears to have taken a loathing to chess. He commenced the study of law, but did not follow it up, not being adapted to that profession.

ROBERT E. LEE, JR., son of the late distinguished Confederate General, is spoken of as a probable candidate for Governor of Virginia. The papers of that State do not consider him in all respects suited to fill a place; but the people, it is believed, will elect him.

LET THE TOAST BE "DEAR WOMAN."—A wretch in England lately practically interpreted this by putting his own wife on the gridiron over a bed of live coals. The civil authorities will cause him to respond to that toast.

THOMAS HOLLOWAY, of England, the proprietor of the famous patent medicines which bear his name, is said to be worth $60,000,000. He has recently built an Insane Asylum costing $500,000, and has other charitable schemes on foot on an equally magnificent scale.

WITH the exception of Lous XVIII., not one of the French monarchs has died at the Tuillieries. Louis XVI. was guillotined at La Place de la Revolution; Napoleon I. died in exile at St. Helena; Napoleon II. in exile at Reichstadt; Charles X. in exile at Holyrood; Louis Philippe in exile at Claremont; Napoleon III. at Chiselhurst.

COTTON IN CALIFORNIA.—The commercial editor of the New Orleans Picayune commends upon the results following the cultivation of cotton in California, and predicts that the future "cotton belt" will include the region traversed by the Texas and Pacific Railway, and a larger portion of this State. The climate of California, he says, is evidently well adapted for cotton culture. The plant flourishes best in dry weather. The rainy season of the Pacific coast lasts just long enough to bring the young plant to a healthy condition.

SALE OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.—Private dispatches were received from the East yesterday announcing that the sale of the Southern Pacific Railroad to Tom Scott had been finally consummated. The information comes to the Chronicle on the authority of Major R. P. Hammond, and is doubtless reliable. The price reported is $6,000,000. This news will gladden the hearts of San Franciscans, for Scott is a driving railroad man and will infuse uncommon vitality into the Southern route.—Chronicle, March 27.

PARIS, March 26.—Countess Gulecioli, who was at one time brought prominently before the public in connection with the Lord Byron scandal, died to-day, aged 72 years. Teresa Gambe, Countess Gulecioli, was of Italian parentage, and was born in Romagna in 1800. At the age of sixteen she was married to Count Gulecioli, an Italian nobleman. She owes her celebrity to her alleged liaison with Lord Byron in 1820. She wrote a work called "My Recollections of Byron." Although her own name does not appear as the writer, there appears to be no doubt as to the authorship.

FRENCH GERMAN WAR STATISTICS.—At length we possess definite statistics showing the German losses in the war with France. The total number killed, wounded and missing amounts to 127,697. Of these there were killed in action 17,572; those who died afterwards from their wounds numbered 10,710; from sickness, 12,253; from accidents, 116. From which it will be seen that the total number who died being thus 40,881, including 1,534 officers. During the war there were no less than 1,599 encounters with the enemy, by which were attended with loss.

DOME MINING PAY?—The Sacramento Union takes issue with Prof. Carr on this question, and points out the absurdity of a statement made by the latter as to the number of men extensively engaged in mining in California. The Professor asserts the statistics that 50,000 men work 300 days in each year to produce $20,000,000, and calculates that at $2 50 per day their wages alone, at some other pursuit, would bring them $37,500,000, thus showing a loss by mining of $17,500,000, the Union asserts that there are not over 30,000 men actually engaged in mining, and further, asserts that the annual gold yield divided among this number gives an average of $8 33 per day for each man.

A CHARACTER.—An English journal says: "Those who were at Chiselhurst on the occasion of the lying in state of the Emperor Napoleon must have noticed a very tall, broad-shouldered man, who, in evening dress, with a fur cape over his shoulders, was seemingly smoking cigarettes. This was M. Paul de Cassagnac, the celebrated fighting editor of the Pays, who has slain eighteen men by his small-sword practice in duels, and who was one of the most vigorous supporters of the pen and sword, of the Bonapartist régime. He is now middle-aged, slightly inclined to stout, but when he fit is over he has to undergo a duel with M. Mane, the fighting editor of the Gaulois, also an expert swordsman and duelist."

A NAPOLEONIC RELIC.—A Paris correspondent writes to the Pall Mall Gazette: "The second number of the Academy has just died, at the good age of 93—General Comte de Ste Jur, so well-known for his history of the Russian Campaign, for which he bore part as a General of the brigade. He is the last surviving General of that terrible retreat from Moscow. He entered the army in 1799 as a simple hussar, and served on Macdonald's staff at Hohenlinden. He was afterwards attached to Prince Joseph Bonaparte, and saw service in Italy and afterwards in Spain, as long ago as 1807-9, when he was a General and went to Russia. In 1813 he fought on the Rhine, and took a brilliant part in the campaign of France. From 1848 the General lived in retirement. He was elected to the Academy in 1870.

FROM Richard Ish, lately in from the Modoc country, the Portland Times learns that Bogart, the San Francisco Chronicle correspondent, was drummed out of headquarters and made to decamp, because of false reports. Bogart was arbitrarily arrested last night by the provost marshal in office, by two marines, acting under instructions of Admiral Selfridge, of Mare Island, who acted under orders from Secretary Robeson, of the Navy. The charge against Bogart is, that many years ago, while acting as Paymaster, a clerk in the office said $16,000; but the real motive appears to be that his many disclosures of corruptions in the department which are highly damaging to the powers that be. For this he was twice sued, and acquitted. The circumstances of the arrest are deserving of the severest censures and we hope those guilty of it will be severely punished. No man's liberty is worth an hour's purchase if the Washington authorities can order his incarceration at option.

The Debts of Europe.

The Pall Mall Gazette thinks it may be very useful at the present moment, when England's attention is becoming pointedly directed to her own expenditure, to reflect on the burdens under which other nations are unhappily groaning. It is not a very easy matter to discover the actual indebtedness of either Europe or the world; but it is possible, the Gazette thinks, to give an approximate estimate of the total liabilities of continental nations. There are seven European nations which owe upwards of £100,000,000 each. They are:

| | |
|---|---|
| Great Britain | £700,000,000 |
| France | 745,000,000 |
| Italy | 300,000,000 |
| Russia | 385,000,000 |
| Austria | 340,000,000 |
| Spain | 150,000,000 |
| Turkey | 124,000,000 |
| Total | 3,744,000,000 |

The debt of the German Empire amounts to a little over £35,000,000. The different States composing it, however, owe in the aggregate about £173,000,000. The liabilities of the Empire may, therefore, be placed at about £208,000,000. The debts of the eight above heavily encumbered European countries may in this way be raised to about £3,152,000,000! There are six other countries in Europe which owe their creditors more than £10,000,000, but less than £100,000,000. They are: Holland, Portugal, Belgium, Greece, Roumania and Denmark. These six countries add £214,000,000 to our previous total, and raise the national liabilities of Europe to £3,366,000,000.

The Fourbons.

All hopes of the "fusion" between the princely Comte de Chambord and his time-serving cousins are, humanly speaking, at an end. The important letter from the Comte to the Bishop of Orleans, in which, long-expected event to be as far off as ever. Mgr. Dupanloup has addressed the legitimate king on behalf of the fusion, and suggested that, in not expediting it, he deserted "his providential mission to save a people." The prince deems it his duty to preserve in its integrity the hereditary principle, "without which he is nothing, and with which he is all." The bishop had prayed the king to accept the tri-color instead of the white flag. In reply to this, the latter has argumentad and denounce that France would be more understand the Head of the House of Bourbon "denying his flag," than the Bishop of Orleans re-signing himself to sit side by side with M. Littre in the Academy, or to accept ease and athiesm." He expected little "from the clever derisce of men"—another cut at the peace-making prelate—but much from the mercy of God; and in all his bitter trials looks for consolation to the august mercy of the Virgin. Exit the fusion, and enter more confusion. This quarrel, it is stated, will give the Freedom a decided majority in the Assembly.—Catholic Opinion, March 1.

Burning of a Church in Italy.

The Voce della Verita of February 14th says: "The little Church of St. Bernard, at Poligno, took fire during vespers on Sunday last, and the drapery, which had not been removed since the celebration of a recent festival, rapidly spread the flames through-

Wendell Phillips on Sumner.

Wendell Phillips does not approve of the vote of censure in the Massachusetts Legislature against Sumner, on account of his resolution to erase the names of battles from the National flag. He says he has no fear of injury to Sumner, as his record is made up and is far beyond any insult's reach. No Legislature can harm his fame. His objection to the resolutions is that they disgrace Massachusetts. They condemn Mr. Sumner unheard, which is improper as well as unjust. He expresses himself as follows:

Mr. Sumner only asks that the national flag, under which we compel the citizen to march, shall not bear any inscription that ought to give him pain. The flags our national regiments march under belong as much to South Carolina as to Massachusetts. Georgians will be called to defend them as much as we are. Is it generous, is it wise, to ask them to pour out their blood for a flag which is written all over with the disgrace of their fathers? Show me the community of the nation that has ever inflicted such an insult on any of its people. Greece republicans it; France and Germany scorn it. England allows no name on any of her flags which can pain a Cavalier or a Roundhead, a Scotchman or an Irishman. Whoo, in 1758, I think, William Pitt, at the head of affairs, called Scotland, and called the Highlanders into the army, he gave them back their tartans, before illegal. How utterly inconsistent would he have been had he required them to march under banners where every man saw written in fiery letters the word "rebel."

If we attempt such an outrage as those insulted flags, we shall have made the first example of it. I should despise a Southerner who would march under such a flag. And if I should not, I should more heartily a North that could ask him to do so. A North that could submit to such indignity, would make up a nation of which the age ought to be ashamed. Sooner or later, in due time, to follow Mr. Sumner's lead. Ten years hence the universal verdict will be too small to be counted. Let such a disgrace ful banning be once borne by Carolinians and Yankees over the glorious field, and his men themselves would fully celebrate the victory by tearing down the flag to place a clasping generous and brave hands over its rage.

The following record of female avocations in the United States is taken from the recent census returns: Independent of woman farmers there are 45 female stock herders, 6 superintendents, 2 undertakers, 2 boarding-house, 2 professional hunters and trappers, 5 lawyers, 525 physicians and surgeons, 87 clergymen, 2 sawyers, 3 soldiers, 10 "canal men," 106 "draymen," 1 pilot of inland waters, 1 gas-house laborers, 1 gas-house foreman, 2 gunpowder makers and 16 shipbuilders.

A magnificent stained-glass window, the gift of a lady parishioner, has just been erected in the Church of St. Ambrose, Chelsea, the subject is the Assumption, Our Lady appearing in the midst of a golden cloud, in the midst of angels, and being surrounded by others. It is the work of Meyer & Co. of London and Munich.

Jedediah Hurchard, once preaching a revival sermon, was interrupted by the entrance of Aaron Burr. "Here comes one," said the revivalist, "against whom even I will testify in the day of judgment." "Yes, sir," said Burr, "the day of criminal evidence I have always found the greatest rascal turn State's evidence."

Among the strange causes of suicide, that of ingrowing matrimony is reported from Kentucky. A young man in Nelson county" who was doomed to wed within a week, lately shot himself without any apparent reason, unless to escape the dilemma in which he had placed himself. Whether his act was an evidence of insanity or of unusual sanity, is a matter of opinion.

A Disease with a Thousand Symptoms.

Dyspepsia is the most perplexing of all human ailments. Its symptoms are almost infinite in their variety, and the forlorn and despondent victims of this disease often fairly themselves the prey, in turn, of every known malady. This is due, in part, to the close sympathy which exists between the stomach and the brain, and in part also to the fact that any disturbance of the digestive function necessarily disorders the liver, the bowels and the nervous system, and affects, to some extent, the quality of the blood. A medicine that, like Hostetter's Bitters, not only tones the stomach, but at the same time controls the liver, produces a regular habit of body, braces the nerves, and purifies the blood, is certain to a speedy cleansing. It is therefore the most reliable specific for chronic indigestion. Such is the character of this famous vegetable restorative. It not only cures dyspepsia, but also all concomitants and consequences. Moreover, it is invaluable as a preventive of indigestion. No one who chooses to take half a wine-glassful of this agreeable appetizer and stomachic habitually three times a day will ever be troubled with dyspepsia after eating, nausea, sour eructations, or any other indication of a want of vigor in the digestive and assimilative functions. Fever and ague and other unpleasant maladies, to which residents in miasmatic districts are peculiarly subject, are also promptly relieved by the Bitters; and persons who are constitutionally inclined to look upon life "as through a glass, darkly," will be apt to take a brighter and more hopeful view of the situation under the genial influence of this wholesome medicinal stimulant.

Says John to Nancy, "You look so bright;
Your eyes, they sparkle like a star."
"Oh, Pat," says Nancy, "it's Kitzy's Remedy
Has cured that horrid bad catarrh."

"HEALING ON THE WINGS," say all who have used one of Dr. Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry, and by such we have cured of coughs, colds, bronchitis, sore throat, influenza, or consumption. The prudent will always keep this standard remedy by them.

HOME RULE.

Address to the People of Ireland.

At a meeting of the Council of the Home Government Association, held on 3d inst., Isaac Butt, Esq., Q. C., M. P., in the chair, the following address to the People of Ireland was unanimously adopted:

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN—In the name of that a general election cannot be delayed. Every day's experience supplies new proofs to the reckless folly of the Government in the great cause in which we are engaged; and that Ireland should remain represented for the assertion, and the pressing necessity of which, whenever that opportunity may arise, is the first duty of every representative of a tributary province to the house.

Let us then address ourselves to the work, sinking her own interests, and unfolding her own resources for the benefit of her own children. Let us show that we are fit to govern ourselves, and that self-government is emphatically your cause—

THE WHOLE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

Fellow-countrymen! The great facts which are known to you, and which are well known to your enemies, the Irish subjects of the Crown are poor and discontented, and that its consequent action in Ireland is to influence and to corrupt the Irish members. You know that in 1779 the Irish Parliament, given by the fears of England was compelled by the Irish people, through her legislature, to declare the right of Ireland to free trade, and the declaration of her assembly, that the Irish people was instituted, the constitutional guarantee of Irish liberty. Ireland is prosperous and happy. Her trade is increasing, her manufactures flourish, and the Union was carried by the most corrupt and unscrupulous means which would ever have been resorted to to effect the destruction of the Irish Parliament compared with

The Late Very Rev. Dr. Croke.

The remains of this venerable and much esteemed clergyman were on Tuesday conveyed from the parish chapel—where they lay in state during Monday, Monday night and part of Tuesday, surrounded by numerous sorrowing and loving people, who loved him to the last, and for whom he in return during life devoted all the energies of his loving soul—to the vault in the Convent chapel, prepared by his directions some years since. A catafalque on which the coffin rested was deeply draped in black, as was also the coffin, which was of oak, covered with black cloth, with suitable mountings, and a shield breastplate with the inscription:

Very Rev. Thomas Croke, P.P., V.G., Charleville.
Died February 12, 1873, aged 80 years.
R.i.p.-Requiescat in pace.

The altar, pulpit, images, galleries, and his own confessional were also deeply draped in mourning, which presented a sad appearance, and all was stillness within publicly to attend a great loss, except when that deathlike stillness was broken by the frequent fusileys of a fond parishioner moving towards the head of the coffin to catch one longing look at that straight and gentle form so often admonishing voice so often resounded within the walls wherein he then lay a lifeless corpse. After the Office for the Dead (sung chaunt by upwards of thirty clerical voices, and solemn High Mass being offered by the Lord Bishop of Cloyne, the Most Rev. Dr. Keane, a procession was formed outside the chapel gate, headed by the children of the different schools, the children of the convent schools wearing black, and carrying baptismal tapers, which were also draped. Next came the clergy in surplices and stoles, headed by the Rev. Father Hayden, C.C., Charleville, bearing a large black cross and crucifix deeply draped. Next came the coffin, borne on a handsome hearse on four men's shoulders: then the gentry and respectable shopkeepers all wearing crape; then came a large contingent of tradesmen and laborers of every class; after which a large number of people walked, who did not join in the procession. The rear was brought up by a long line of carriages, belonging to the gentlemen and the respectable people of the surrounding country. Though the weather was not favorable to the processionists, yet it did not in the least damp the ardor of the people to pay a last and well merited tribute of respect to their devoted pastor, even the Lord Bishop (though, as I was informed, in rather delicate health) walked the entire of the route under a smart downpour of rain —such was the estimation he was held in by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. This cannot be better described than by the respect exhibited by all classes, even those who differed from him in religion. From midday on Saturday—the day on which he breathed his last—every shop window in the town was closed, and business pratically suspended until after Tuesday. Monday being party sessions day, Mr. Bruce, J.P., Milltown Castle, came into court and asked he would the Bench as a venerable gentleman was dead whom his father and grandfather had the pleasure of being intimately acquainted with. Mr. Sanders and Mr. Harding also rose and said the same of the deceased. The mantle of the late Very Rev. Dr. Croke, Charleville, bearing a large black cross and crucifix deeply draped. Mr. Sanders and Mr. Harding also rose and said the same of the deceased. The mantle of the late Very Rev. Dr. Croke, Charleville, bang on a large nail in the sacristy, and the coffin taken to its last resting place in the church. The multitude then parsed to the prayers of a grateful people to their lips for the repose of the soul of a pious and zealous clergyman.—Dublin Freeman, March 1.

Irish History Resumed.

The Dublin correspondent of the Tablet shows by the following anecdote the anti-national character of the Irish Model Schools:

When Dr. Lyon Playfair, M. P., was in Dublin lately, making inquiries regarding the education question, he visited among other institutions, the Central Model Schools, Marlborough street, where he was received by Mr. P. J. Keenan, C. B., Resident Commissioner, who conducted him through the several departments of the establishment. On visiting the boys' school, Dr. Joyce, the head master, examined several classes for the distinguished Scotch Professor, who expressed in the highest terms his gratification at the proficiency and attainments of the lads, especially in mental arithmetic and in geography. Having declined leave to take part in the examination, Dr. Playfair shunted more naturally from the ensemble of Ireland, upon which he had been exam ining the class, to the national history. He asked, "Where was the Confederation of Kilkenny, and how did it originate?" The bright faces and beaming eyes that were just rapidly answering intricate questions in mental arithmetic, which, as Professor Playfair stated, would have puzzled a palace, relaxed not yet dim, and the blank ignorance set where Celtic intelligence but just now flashing. "Who was Owen Roe O'Neill?" followed. Perfect silence, with arabesque interchange of glances between the Resident Commissioner, the head master, and the entourage of officials who attended the distinguished visitor. "What were the losses attained on the Battle of the Boyne, and who was the result?" One last timidly held out his hand as if to say he could answer, and said, "Orangemen and Catholics; King James ran away." "Who was the Duke of Tyrconnell?" "Favorite and shuse." "For what is Limerick remarkable?" "They make good bacon, sir," said a boy, likely the scion of an Italian warehouseman, for, as likely, a lad from Carrygowen itself. At this stage, the Resident Commissioner interposed.—Dr. Playfair, I did not wish to interrupt you, but you, evidently, do not say, or say to be aware that, under our system, history, or at least Irish history, is, unfortunately, excluded." "Well! Mr. Keenan, do you mean to state that these highly intelligent boys are forbidden to learn the history of their own Irish history, in the supreme midst of Irish National subsoil?" "I grieve to say, Dr. Playfair, that such is the fact." "Well, sir," said the learned Professor, waxing warm, I have to inform you that such is not an outrage attempted on the schools in Scotland, the whole population would rise, as one man, and take up arms against such a system." Dr. Playfair will doubtless, tell this incident with effect when the University question comes on for discussion, especially in connection with the exclusion of Ussher's History.

Had Dr. Playfair extended his notice to the Very Rev. Dr. Fitzgerald, P. P., V. G., Carrick-on-Suir, is to be the Coadjutor-Bishop of the diocese of Waterford and Lismore. Dr. Fitzgerald is a native of Dublin, and, among the people of Waterford at this result, and at the election by the clergy, Dr. Fitzgerald stood figuratively.—Dublin Nation, March 15.

Protestant Testimonies in the Force of the Catholic Claims.

Mr. Miall, one of the rare advocates for the second reading of the University bill, said that the demander of the Catholic agitators were "unethical," and that "no administration could stand by them without being turned out within a fortnight;" but Dr. Ball—though he did not repeat what he said at the meeting of the Senate of Trinity College, namely, that "the only logical alternative is to universally abandon Ireland, to the endowment of denominational colleges"—protested against a cynical observation of Mr. Lowe's, that the organization of the Catholic bishops must be treated as though it were "an earthquake or other natural calamity," saying that "the Public race could bear wrong, but was unforgiving of insult." Dr. Ball could speak against the Gill measure "as was not pretended to see an English Parliament, with the aid of Scotch and Welsh votes, force on Ireland a measure which every class of Irish opinion condemns." Mr. Horsman, however, who was as lively and amusing as usual, followed in the same line. He could not face his constituents if he voted for the bill, "unless he confronted his old friends at Liskeard," to use he thought Mr. Horsman would very soon have to go. And "speaking from a Protestant point of view, and entirely ignoring that of the Roman Catholics," he emphatically denied that it was "a priest's question." If Mr. Horsman "had any knowledge of Ireland, he ought to have known that in Ireland he could not separate the priest from the people." Yet the Queen's Colleges he held the house that the gold medalists of Galway—which he believed to be the best of the three—had to soon sometimes plucked, and obliged to send elsewhere before they could pass a creditable examination. Mr. Horsman did not say he had always regretted that parties did not agree in "leveling up," and "pulling down" to the standard of Mr. Pim—a Protestant—that if Ireland possessed a Parliament of her own, even though it were all Protestant, he had no doubt that it would endow a Catholic university; and he referred to the House that Dr. Shaw, a member fellow of Trinity had also said that even if there were a Protestant majority in the House of Parliament it would endow the Catholic college in Stephen's Green." This would, he said, be a statesmanlike proposition." It was a remarkable fact that Mr. Disraeli, on the following night, used nearly the same words. Do but the least effective point which Mr. Osborne made was the quotation by which he answered the sarcasm, so often repeated, about legislation according to Irish ideas. "In England," said Burke in 1792, "the Roman Catholics are a sect, in Ireland they are a nation. This fundamental difference must affect every measure you may propose concerning them." "If you acknowledge this," said Mr. Osborne, "the true and wise policy would be to give a charter to the Catholic university." To say that the alternative is between legislation according to Imperial or according to Irish ideas is not the true way to put it is to, in fact, a question in connection with the establishment of Union of History.

Mr. Playfair extended his notice to ending to the unanimous wish of Ireland, or presuming for them in such a way as to dissatisfy Ireland, in order "to pander," as Mr. Osborne said, "to English, Scotch and Welsh prejudices."—London Tablet, March 15.

A Comfortable Sinecure.

We have no Tammany rings in connection with the admirably balanced constitutional Government of England; but, somehow or other, the public purse suffers as much from private depredations as ever did the exchequer in New York. The Rev. Mr. Thurlow, for instance, whom we find figuring in the Treasury Returns, is doubtless a very estimable old gentleman; but it may be doubted if ever Mr. Fisk or Jay Gould cost more for the purse-papers of New York than has this gentleman to the overburthened tax payers of Great Britain and Ireland. The Rev. Mr. Thurlow, the name smacks strongly of the nepotism of the woolsack, has been for forty years in the receipt of the comfortable pension of £11,-702 a year—so that, in all, he has drawn very nearly half a million of money out of the pockets of the people. And for what has this enormous sum been paid—what services have been rendered in return for this extravagant remuneration? The reader will ask, but ask in vain. Not a line of eulogist had probably the advantage of "a friend in court," a powerful relative, an influential namesake, and that was all. Of course, some sort of "office" was filled by Mr. Thurlow, namely, as "any one" of the "Patentee of Bankrupts"—whatever that may mean—he was "Prothonotary in the Court of Common Pleas" in Durham: he was "Keeper of the Hanaper." How far the humble occupants of Holy Trinity, who spoke in his usual firm and uncompromising manner, which forbids the idea that he will ever stay to rescued on this occasion.—Nation, March 15.

Indian Blasphemy.

The infamous Roman Journal the Opinione, over which the Italian Attorney-General had no control when it early blasphemed the memory of Christ, has actually dared to breathe a wish for the destruction of the monarchy, and has been summarily confiscated. Time tries the thin paper have, notwithstanding, had the effect of rousing Catholic sentiment throughout Italy. Many Catholic Italians have united to make a joint protest against the publication of these articles, and against the supineness of the authorities in permitting them, and in order to wipe out as much as possible the slur upon Italy by such vile works. At the head of this Catholic movement stands a Central Committee in Florence, Milan, Verona, Venice, Naples, Cremona, Lucca, Modena, Bologna and Turin.

RUSSIA.

The Church and the Poles.

The situation of the Polish clergy is this: Not being governed by an independent Episcopate—it is well known how nominations are made—the clergy are disunited, and are too often actuated by personal views. Moreover, the seminaries and ecclesiastical academies are far from being in a position to train up worthy representatives of the priesthood. The instructions given in them is miserably defective; and, consequently, the clergy are not in a position to form an understanding their mission. Also, being certain of being opposed against their bishops, they constantly look to the Government for authority, and thus an archbishop may well say that he has no priests. Moreover, the cause on the one side he has to contend against the Government, and on the other against his own clergy. It is perfectly true that the present worthy archbishop is not a man of great energy of character, and that he is surrounded by men who are not the best counsellors in the world. Many difficulties he has to discharge, and this is why the state of things present so sad a picture. The Archbishop is fully aware how you do anything of the sort. General de Ladmirault is a supreme officer of the Russian Church, and altogether devoted to the cause of order." What does that matter? observed M. Thiers; "I have the right to remove him, and the power also." "No, you cannot," said the Duke; "you cannot remove yourself, Marshal!" "Try it," replied MacMahon, "and I put this matter before the National Assembly, who will decide between you and me." The colloquy stopped there; and M. Thiers has since had more silent dealings with General Ladmirault by General Fadeïeffe.

M. Luyeux.

The renegade Abbé Carmelite with his American wife have arrived at Geneva, where he has been received with open arms by the Calvinistic persecutors of Mgr. Mermillod. Luyeux is not generally popular, but it is generally believed that he is to be presented by the National Government to a living in a Catholic parish, and forced upon a Catholic community against their will. This would be but a repetition of the Falconio case, and the infamous treatment of the Vicar-Apostolic of Geneva and the Bishop of Sidoure by the Swiss Government.

GERMANY.

A Remarkable Career.

A correspondent at Beyrout writes to the Germania Gazette of Viennat "I met to-day an old acquaintance, the camel-driver, Sheikh Abdul, and he told me that his wife has died. Abdul's wife was an extraordinary woman. Her name was once known all through Europe. Sualeh Abdul is the ninth husband of Lady Ellenborough, whom I met here three years ago at Mount Lebanon. Just after she had eloped with the Prince Schwarzenberg from the residence of her first husband, she then went to Italy, where, as she told me herself, she got married on a eighth marriage, with the Greek Colonel, Count Theodaki—however also only for a short time. He afterwards became Minister at Athens, where she concluded her ninth marriage, with this Colonel, Count Theodaki—however also only for a short time. His affections were now bestowed on an old Palmer chieftain, for whom she built a beautiful house at Athens. When that last marriage was again dissolved, she went to the Levant. During a journey from Beyrout to Damascus she got pleased with the camel-driver, Sheikh Abdul, and selected him for her ninth husband. She was married to him after the Arab fashion, and accompanied him for a whole year on his journeys between Damascus and Palmyra, faithfully fulfilling her duties. She even imitated the camels. When she had grown tired of the roamed life, she built for herself a charming palace at Damascus, where her latest husband, whenever he visited Damascus, found hospitality for some days. I had heard nothing of her since 1865, when I met her here, dressed as an Arab woman, and, not unbeautiful, the wrinkles in her face, still beautiful. Soon after she was the seventh against her first husband, when the statements respecting the end of the persecution must be, if not false, the only relief concerning the Christians was one dated the 15th March, 1872, and was thus entitled: "Proclamation concerning Christians who have recanted." We shall soon learn whether the recent measure is an amnesty of a more genuine character.—London Tablet, March 15.

A TOUCH OF NATURE.

MUSIC IN CAMP.

The appended fine ballad, by a writer identified with the choicest literature of the South is worthy of extraordinary attention. Its grand lyric swing, its sublime close, and its terrible critique of the battle-field, will assure it a place in the hearts of the people:

Two armies covered hill and plain
Where Rappahannock's waters
Ran deeply crimsoned with the blood
Of battle's recent slaughters.

The morning's golden light crept down
To meet as if heavenly amore,
And each cloud gem of the dewy night
Fled in its kid embrace.

The long roll sullenly beat
No forest leaf to quiver
And the weary of the earliest
Rolled slowly from the river.

And now where circling hills looked down
With cannon grimly planted,
Our fathers came and offered them
Their children as a holocaust.

When on the fateful air there came
A strain as wild as human,
The music seemed itself alliance
With all the powers of man.

A Federal band, which yet not born
Had learned the conqueror's trade,
Sent back upon the wings of morn
The anthem which they played.

Down flocked the soldiers to the bank
To see what meant the song
Once wakened there was none left blank
And not a soul was wrong.

Then all was still, and then the band,
With sweetened light and lively,
Rent all the air with "Yankee Doodle"
Reverberate with "Dixie."

Across a space, and then again
The trumpet pealed responsive
And "Hail Columbia" hailed the strain
To which the shore gave chorus.

The laughing ripple shoreward flew
To kiss the dimpled river,
The warring Gods on Hills looked down
And smiled as well as they.

And yet more fair the night sang
Above the camps of armies,
No shout upon the evening rang—
Each lip was mute with music.

The sad, silent stream its memories freed
To all who lived near the river,
All silent now the Yankees stood—
All silent stood the Rebs.

No mere separate word had heard
Had prejudice much opposing
No deeply hidden chord of love
The hidden fount of feeling.

Of blue or gray no thought had they,
As by the wand of fairy,
They were boys of the North and trees,
The cabin by the prairie.

Cool old or cool and white
Both in their beauty ever kind;
Sweet memories hushed the foeman's heart
His crowned vines stole to mind.

As Father the true affair rang
Each boy's heart beat number,
The Volga boatman's chorus rose
Like circles in the water.

Then Home, Sweet Home, the theme
Which tells our every nation
Which tells mid wanderings the heart
Of love for fireside passion.

And fair the form of Maid mirrored
Within the breast of Mother,
Who still was cherished in the heart
Despite the hate of battle.

Then Auld Lang Syne, the song
Of songs for friendship formed,
Jove's Kingdom!

The opposed foe hailed, by a writer identified with the choicest literature of the South is worthy of extraordinary attention. Its grand lyric swing, its sublime close, and its terrible critique of the battle-field, will assure it a place in the hearts of the people:

The hidden fount of feeling.

Of blue or gray no thought had they,
As by the wand of fairy,
They were boys of the North and trees,
The cabin by the prairie.

Cool old or cool and white
Both in their beauty ever kind;
Sweet memories hushed the foeman's heart
His crowned vines stole to mind.

As Father the true affair rang
Each boy's heart beat number,
The Volga boatman's chorus rose
Like circles in the water.

Then Home, Sweet Home, the theme
Which tells our every nation
Which tells mid wanderings the heart
Of love for fireside passion.

And fair the form of Maid mirrored
Within the breast of Mother,
Who still was cherished in the heart
Despite the hate of battle.

Then Auld Lang Syne, the song
Of songs for friendship formed,
Jove's Kingdom!

THE POPE AND THE AMERICANS.

On the 26th February a deputation of American Catholics, headed by the Rev. Dr. Chatard, Rector of the American College, had the honor of being admitted to the presence of the Holy Father. They were animated by the desire of presenting, at the throne of the Supreme Pontiff, against the usurpation of the sacred rights of the Holy See, and of witnessing to him their sincere, their filial and most profound attachment. The deputation was presented to the Holy Father by the Rev. Rector of the American College, and Mr. Glover read in the French language, in the name of all present, the following

ADDRESS.

Most Holy Father: Whilst your children of the United States are all deafened at beholding your august person, and of hearing the voice of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, it is a great privilege for us to be enabled to address you in their name, and to profess our sentiments of loyalty to the See of St. Peter and to all the rights thereto belonging. If nothing is more dear to the heart of a son than to contemplate the features of his father, what should not the heart of a Catholic feel who sees in your Holiness not only the most dear to us, but also the representative of Him who loved us with an eternal love, as has also your own heart, which is the type for us.—Nothing, Most Holy Father, can be sweeter, nor bring us greater consolation, than coming to your feet to express you our wishes, to console you with our love, and to receive your blessing and to assure you in every way according to our strength. And one consolation becomes still greater when we see that your Holiness does not fail to be considered as ours only, but is thought to be also the common father of all Catholic compatriots of the United States.

Every where, Most Holy Father, a cry of grief is raised against the unjust attacks of the sufferings of Our Holy Mother the Church, at the head of the sacred right of which your Holiness has in the greatest merit of the flock entrusted to you by the Divine Shepherd, and it is because of this which Providence has given to the successors of the Prince of the Apostles, to the end of preserving the unity of the Catholic church. For evils which His Divine wisdom has permitted to overwhelm society, the patient resist but the promises which He has made us, and the predictions of His Gospel Word, are the certain cause of our hope which will not be deceived. He has promised never to abandon His Church, and it is permitted to us that the words of His impious shall not prosper. As true as it is an illusion unto the universe, so true it is that the kingdom of iniquity, which has established in the Holy City, will receive from the judgment of God and world its deserves. Meanwhile we feel proud to belong to this Church by mourning; we feel courage, full of faith, and in our very tribulations a unity joy fills our hearts, because we remember that the words of the Lord will abide you as it has rested on before you; and I have overcome the world." With your Holiness we seek through the dead of the world; it is the age of the impious, and the sufferings of the Church in the example of the Divine Master who is the head of resurrection, we are filled with courage, but

The Late Very Rev. Dr. Cooke.

The remains of this venerable and much esteemed clergyman were on Tuesday conveyed from the parish chapel—where they lay in state during Monday, Monday night and part of Tuesday, surrounded by numerous sorrowing and loving people, who loved him to the last, and for whom he in return during life deemed all the energies of his loving soul—to the vault in the Convent chapel, prepared by his directions some years since. A cavalcade on which the coffin rested was deeply draped in black, as was also the coffin, which was of oak, covered with black cloth, with suitable mountings, and a shield breastplate with the inscription:

Very Rev. Thomas Cooke, P. P., V. G., Charleville.

Died February 22, 1873, aged 76 years.

Requiescat in pace.

The altar, pulpit, lutigers, galleries, and his own confessional were also deeply draped in mourning, which presented a sad appearance, and all was stillness within (which hallowed a great deal), except when the deathlike stillness was broken by the frequent footstep of a friend passing or moving towards the head of the coffin to catch one longing look at that straight and gentle form whose astonishing voice so often resounded within the walls wherein he then lay a lifeless corpse. After the office for the Dead being chanted by upwards of thirty clerical voices, and solemn High Mass being offered by the Lord Bishop of Cloyne, the Most Rev. Dr. Keane, a procession was formed outside the chapel gate, headed by the children of the different schools, the children of the convent schools wearing black, and carrying black muslin, which were also draped. Next came the clergy in surplices and stoles, headed by the Rev. Peter Higgins, C.C., Charleville, bearing a large black cross and crucifix deeply draped. Next came the coffin, borne on a bier, and carried on four men's shoulders; then the gentry and respectable shopkeepers, all wearing crape; then came a large contingent of tradesmen and laborers of every class; after which a large number of people walked, who did not join in the procession. The rear was brought up by a long line of carriages, the long number of which, and the respectable people of the surrounding country, though the weather was not favorable to the processionists, yet it did not in the least damp the ardor of the people to pay a last and heartfelt tribute of respect to their devoted pastor, even the Lord Bishop (though, as I was informed, in rather delicate health) walked the entire of the route under a smart downpour of rain —such was the estimation he was held in by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance. This cortege is a better description than by the respect exhibited by all classes, even those who differed from him in religion. From middle to Sackville—the lane (on which he breathed his last—every shop window in the town was closed, and most of them partially or entirely until after Tuesday. Monday being petty sessions day, Mr. Thomas F. Miller, Crown solicitor, came and court stood as would not sit, as a seventeen gentlemen was dead whose father and grandfather had the pleasure of being intimately acquainted with. Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Harding also refused to sit. The route of the procession was—from the chapel down to the mill, up the broad street, through the Main street, to the tilen, by Cork road to the Cross of Ballyvalla, from thence westward to the Cross on the New Line, down the New Line to Main street, down Main street again to the cemetery, where the procession halted, and the coffin taken to its last resting place in the Abeyal. The multitude then joined with the prayers of a grateful people on their lips for the repose of the soul of a priest and zealous clergyman.—Dublin Freeman, March 1.

We regret to say that by an oversight the above was omitted from our last publication.]

Irish History Resumed.

The Dublin correspondent of the Tablet sheds a ray of light following, amidst the sectarian character of the Irish Model Schools:

Whom Dr. Lyon Playfair, M. P., was in Dublin lately, making inquiries regarding the education question, he visited among other institutions, the Central Model Schools, Marlborough street, where he was received by Mr. P. J. Keenan, D. S., Resident Commissioner, who conducted him through the several departments of the establishment. On visiting the boys' school, Dr. Joyce, the head literary examiner, was found at classes for the distinguished booth Professor, who expressed in the highest terms his gratification at the ability and the attainments of the lads, especially in mental arithmetic and in geography. He was then ushered have to take part in the examination. Dr. Playfair shouted some questions from the top of the form, upon which he had been examining the class, in the national history. He asked, "When was the Confederation of Kilkenny, and how did it originate?" The bright face and beaming eyes that had just rapidly answered intricate questions in mental arithmetic, which, as Professor Playfair stated, would have puzzled Laplace, relaxed and got dim, and blank surprise set where Celtic intelligence had just been flashing. "Who was Owen Roe O'Neill?" followed. Perfect silence, with anxious interchange of glances between the Resident Commissioner, the head master, and the entourage of officials who attended him, distinguished the room. "What were the issues at stake at the Battle of the Boyne, and what was the result?" One lad timidly held out his hand as a signal that he could answer, and said, "Orangemen and Catholics; King James ran away." "Who was this Duke of Tyrconnell?" Vacancy and silence. "For what is Limerick remarkable?" "They make good lace there, sir," said a boy, likely the son of an Italian warehouseman, or, as likely, a lad from Garryowen itself. At this stage, the Resident Commissioner interposed. "Dr. Playfair, I did not wish to interrupt you, but you, evidently, do not appear to be aware that, under our system, history, or at least Irish history, is unfortunately, excluded." "What! Mr. Keenan, do you mean to state that these highly intelligent boys are forbidden to learn the matter in which Irish history, in the supreme model of Irish educational schools?" "I grieve to say, Dr. Playfair, that such is the fact." "Well, sir," said the learned Professor, waxing warm, I have to inform you that were such an outrage attempted on the schools in Scotland, the whole population would rise as one man, and take up arms against such a system." Dr. Playfair will doubtless, tell this incident with effect when the University question comes on for discussion, especially in connection with the exclusion of Chairs of History.

Had Dr. Playfair extended his notice to the Model Schools, he would have found that they were equally at fault with the Model Schools in their treatment of Irish history.—Nation, March 15.

Why Presbyterians Advocate Mixed Education.

The following passage from a letter addressed by Mr. James J. Shaw, Professor in Magee College, Derry, to the Times, gives what we have long been convinced was the real and true explanation of the Presbyterian love for mixed education:

"Mr. Whittle is quite justified in claiming the Presbyterian people as friends to mixed education in Ireland; but he is not justified in concluding that they are, therefore, enemies to Magee College. The aim of the Presbyterian Church on this question is much misunderstood. Presbyterians have no objection to denominational education for themselves; they only object to give denominational education to Catholics, and this for many years been accident supporters of mixed education in the Queen's Colleges; but the simple reason is that the Queen's College mixture has always had a predominantly Protestant and Evangelical flavor. Let the Government appoint Dr. Ward or Mr. Herbert Spencer to the next vacant chair of philosophy in Belfast, and the country will soon learn the depth of Presbyterian devotions to mixed education. I would not be misunderstood. I am myself a thorough-going advocate of mixed education. I consider the freedom of philosophy teaching a matter of greater importance than the prevalence of any system of philosophy. But I know the feeling of the Presbyterian Church, and I am convinced that the Presbyterians love of mixed education simply means hatred of Catholicism, and that its true nature will appear the moment the mixed system threatens to endanger, not Catholic, but Calvinistic, orthodoxy."

Parliamentary Representation.

The vacancy in Tyrone, caused by the death of Mr. Corry, is the subject of much speculation: Colonel Stuart Knox was said in the early part of the week to contemplate coming forward in representation of Dungannon for the purpose of trying his luck with the more important constituency of his county; but the latest news is that Mr. Mulholland, lately a Belfast flax-spinner, will stand in the Conservative interest. The probability is that if an influential man comes forward he will be returned without opposition, as nobody would care much to go to the expense of contesting a seat at a time when a dissolution is so close at hand. The Home Rulers, who constitute an influential and active party in the county, were credited with the idea of starting a candidate, but they will probably reserve their strength till the general election comes round.—Nation.

We note that Mr. J. G. Biggar, of Belfast, was a few days ago relieved by a considerable majority to his seat on the Water Board of that town, after a severe contest. This is the first case of some political importance in which Mr. Biggar is, as our readers are aware, a Home Ruler, and was opposed purely and simply as such. It is also the first case in Irish Parliament would outlow the Catholic religion in Stephen's Green." This would, he said, be a statesmen-like proposition." It is a remarkable fact that Mr. Hirsall, on the following night, used nearly the same words. In the last effective speech which Mr. Osborne made was in opposition to the bill to establish the servium, so often repeated, about legislation according to Irish ideas. "In England," said Burke in 1792, "the Roman Catholics are a sect, in Ireland they are a nation. This fundamental difference must affect every measure you may pass concerning them." "If you adopt college bill," said Mr. Osborne, "the Irish can win politics would be to give a charter to the Catholic university." To say that the alternative is between legislation according to imperial or according to Irish ideas is to use the true way to put it it is, in fact, a question between legislating for Irish ideas according to the unanimous wish of Ireland, or providing for them in such a way as to disarm Ireland, in order "on parade," as Mr. Osborne said, "the English, Scotch and Welsh prejudices."—London Tablet, March 15.

A Comfortable Sinecure.

We have no Tammany rings in connection with the admirably balanced constitutional Government of England; but somehow or other, the public purse suffers as much from private depredations as ever did the exchequer in New York. The Rev. Mr. Thurlow, for instance, whom we find figuring in the Treasury lectures, is doubtless a very estimable old gentleman; but it may be doubted if ever Mr. Fisk or Jay Gould cost more to the ratepayers of New York than has this gentleman to the overburthened tax payers of Great Britain and Ireland. The Rev. Mr. Thurlow, the name smacks strongly of the nepotism of the woolsack, has been for forty years in the receipt of the comfortable pension of £1,702 a year—so that, in all, he has drawn very nearly half a million of money out of the pockets of the people. And for what has this enormous sum been paid—what services have been rendered in return for this extravagant remuneration? The reader will look in vain for an answer. The patriarch had probably the advantage of "a friend in court," a powerful relative, as influential nauseate, and that was all. Of course, some sort of "office" was filled by him, nominally, at any rate. He was "Patentee of Bankrupts"—whatever that may have meant—"Prothonotary in the Court of Common Pleas" in Durham; he was "Keeper of the Hanaper." How far these functions were discharged by the Rev. Mr. Thurlow we cannot say, but we are certain the nominal occupation of the office was consistent with the reverend gentleman's calling as a clergyman we should be sorry to reveal to the public what profit, all these offices have been long since abolished. Yet the reverend gentleman continues to draw on the public purse yearly, to the nice sum of £17,760 a year. He ought to be a model publisher of laws and constitutions at any rate.—Nation.

Adverse Judgments.

Mr. F. Wyndham, Dr. Playfair, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. Hardy —the other British members who spoke on Thursday night—viewing the University bill chiefly from the educational point of view, manifested considerable divergence of opinion but when they touched the essential demands of the Catholics of Ireland, they all spoke in opposition to those demands, and were all in more or less offensive in expressing their views. Thus Dr. Playfair talked a great deal about "the deadling influence of ecclesiastical dictation," and Mr. Lowe said the action of the Catholic bishops should be regarded as an earthquake or any other great calamity which could not be helped. Mr. Hardy, who was an advocate of denominational education for England, declared emphatically for the mixed system as far as Ireland is concerned; and he is the chief Government organ of the House of Commons.—Nation, March 15.

M. Thiers and Marshal MacMahon.

At the suggestion of the Left, M. Thiers has lately determined to replace General de Ladmirault, the Governor of Paris, by General Fabellare, late Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the Loire, and an ultra-Republican. But before actually doing this, he thought it best to consult Marshal MacMahon, and with this object he, on closing the Governor on the Ordre du Jour, and giving him a seat in the box of Marshal's duty was: "Beware how you do anything of the sort. General de Ladmirault is a superior officer of the highest rank, and altogether devoted to the cause of order." What does that matter?" replied M. Thiers "it is quite enough to remove him, and the power also." "No, no, cannot." "What! I cannot! I could remove yourself, Marshal" "Try it," replied MacMahon, "and I put the matter before the National Assembly, and they will decide between you and me." The colloquy was here broken off, and M. Thiers has not stopped there; and M. Thiers has not stopped there; and M. Thiers has not as yet replaced General Ladmirault by General Fabellare.

M. Legeon.

The renegade Jesuit Carmelite with his American wife has arrived at Geneva, where he has been received with open arms by the Calvinistic persecutors of Mgr. Marouillet. He says his mission is simply to preach, but it is generally believed that he is to be presented by the Oratoire Government to a living in Geneva. Catholic priest, and forced upon a Catholic community as their pastor. Should he attempt the legitimate and natural sequel to the infamous treatment of the Vicar-Apostolic of Annecy and the Bishop of Sidnea by the Swiss Government.

A Remarkable Career.

A correspondent at Beyrout writes to the Herman Gazette of Vienna: "I met to-day an old acquaintance, the ex-mufti-driver, Sheikh Abdul, and was amazed at his altered circumstances. He is now a man of wealth, and married his third wife in succession, all those unions were dissolved after a short duration. In 1871 he went to Athens, where she concluded an eighth marriage, with the Greek Colonel, Count Metaxa, whose wife died a few days after the marriage. Her relations were now bestowed on an old Palmar chieftain, for whom she built a beautiful house at Athens. When her latest marriage was again dissolved, she went to the Levant. Sheikh Abdul, who was born in Damascus she got pleased with the camel-driver, Sheikh Abdul, and selected him as her ninth husband. He was married to him after the Arab fashion, and accompanied him for a whole year on his pilgrimages between Bagrant and Babylon, faithfully fulfilling her duties. She even milked the camels. When she had grown tired of the nomad life, she built for herself a charming palace at Damascus, where her latest husband, whenever he came to Damascus, found hospitality for some days. I had heard nothing of her since 1865, when I met her here, dressed as an Arab woman, and, notwithstanding the wrinkles in her face, still beautiful. Soon after she won the lawsuit against her first husband, when the statements respecting the end of the persecution were published, the only probability concerning the Christians was one dated the 13th March, 1872, and was therefore of very recent publication. Christians have only been recently." We shall soon learn whether the recent measure is an answer of a more genuine character.—London Tablet, March 15.

MUSIC IN CAMP.

The appended five hailed by a writer installed with the chief literature of the South is worthy of comparison with Bayard Taylor's "Song of the Soldiers Creed," and merits further circulation for its stirring expression of national loyalty and love:

Two armies covered hill and plain
Where Rappahannock's waters
Ran deeply crimsoned with the stain
Of battle's recent slaughters.

The morning's mist had rolled like taste
To hear, of heavenly azure,
And each fresh gem of the lovely night
Fled to its hid investure.

The breeze was softly now; it shook
No forest leaf to either,
As if the smoke of the ravished cannonade
Befell slowly from the river.

And now where circling hills looked down
With cannon-girded bastion,
Over hollow camp and silent town
The golden sun arose at last,
When on the fervid air there came
A note so wild, so free,
The music seemed like a flame
Of unconfined liberty.

A Federal band, which ever loved
To play at dawn the airs
Which stirred their fathers' hearts and moved
Their fast-arming sires to battle,
Now blent its music with the breeze
That kissed its way to silence.

Down flashed the sad blues to the bank
Of the dim, sluggish river,
One sounded alone was more quiet "Yankee Doodle"
Was the last air they played.

Then all was still; and then the band,
With movement light and nimble,
Made quick response to the cheering call
Reverberate with "Dixie."

The Confederate troops, who lay behind slow,
Went proudly over its pebbles,
And thrilled through all their ranks the flow
With yelling of the Rebels.

Again the trumpet sounded,
The trumpet pealed response,
And "Yankee Doodle" came back to battle
To which is the stone gate chosen.

The laughing ripple shimmered now
Beneath the sun's bright beams,
Soft clarions, like wanting Boys in Blue
In chorus of the scene.

And yet once more the bugle sang
Above the waves of red,
No answer upon the opposing bank—
Their band had fled.

The sad blue airmen in concourse flood
Forward with cheers and yells,
All silent now the Yankees stood—
All dead amid the Rebels.

No correspondence will be found
That pictures in a spirit true
So deeply "Home, sweet Home," had stirred
The hearts of either host.

Of blue or gray, the soldier sees,
As by the wand of fairy,
The cottage home, with all its oak trees,
The union by the prairie.

Or, of the old South Carolina side
Beats in their breasts' one chord
Even thinking of the sunny land
His sacred sires had sword for.

His sacred sires sacred for his.

As fades the light of day,
It Apply's feeble weather,
The stars and stripes and stars and bars
And day night died together.

But memory, waked by music's art,
Subdues the sternest minds,
Melts all the fierce resentments part,
And fair the form of Mercy shines
Transfigured in her kinds.

Then, o'er the sacred pile of those
Who fell, but not in vain,
Unite, and, man to man, and foes
Embrace in love again.

ITALY.

International Deputation.

Among the proofs which his Holiness the Pope has recently received of the devotion of Catholics throughout the world to the interests of the Holy See, probably the most remarkable is to be found in the presentation of an address to him the other day by the International Catholic deputation. The deputation consisted of about two hundred sixty persons, and represented every nation in Europe and the United States, and its language used by it to describe the invasion of Rome, the robbery committed on the Holy See, and the other iniquitous proceedings of the Italian persecutors of the Church, was extremely plain and forcible. It was declared that there never could be a reconciliation between the robbers and the robbed; and that UNTIL JUSTICE was done Catholics committees of the United States.

Every where, Most Holy Father, are expressions of sympathy with you and with all of the sufferings of Our Holy Mother the Church, in addition to the wrongs which your Holiness has in the government of the Pontiff has been outraged to you by the Italian Government. It was hoped that which Providence has given to the successors of the Prince of the Apostles, in the exercise of the liberty of the spiritual power. For souls which His Divine wisdom has redeemed by the Precious Blood of Redemption; but the promises which He has made, and the predictions of His inspired Word, are the certain cause of our hope which will not be deceived. He has promised to be with His Church, and has predicted to us that the words of His impious shall not prosper. As true as is as illustrations the universe, so true is it that the kingdom of iniquity, which is established in the Holy City, will receive from the judgment of God the end which it deserves. Meanwhile we feel proud to belong to the party of the Lord, we feel full of courage, full of faith, and in our very illustrations a merry joy flows over our souls. It is recognized that Christ has said: "In the world will have you as it has hated me before it hated you." Most Holy Father, in the example of the Divine Master we behold the way in which we must follow in Our steps with you. In expectation of this order of victory, we remain with you, Most Holy Father, in the bonds of love and of entire devotion to you. We thank Heaven for the admirable example which you have given to the world, in the person of your Holiness, in the center of the group which is the Catholic, not only of Angelic virtue, but also of heroic fortitude and of apostolic zeal. We pray the Divine Goodness to preserve your days in full vigor, and to grant you the abundant celestial benedictions which we implore for ourselves and for all our dear ones.—Dublin Freeman, March 15.

Italian Blasphemy.

The infamous Roman journal the Capitale, over which the Italian Attorney-General has no control, and which has blasphemed the divinity of Christ, has at length dared to breathe a wish for the destruction of the monarchy, and has been summarily condemned. Guarantees in this paper have, notwithstanding, had the effect of rousing Catholic sentiment throughout Italy, many Catholic Unions have united to make a joint protest against the publication of these articles, and against the indulgence the authorities in permitting them, and in order to wipe out as much as possible the stain which they have made. At the head of this Catholic movement stands a Central Committee at Florence, which has branches at Florence, Milan, Verona, Venice, Naples, Genoa, Lucca, Modena, Bologna and Turin.

The Church and the Poles.

The situation of the Polish clergy is this: Not being governed by an independent Episcopate—it is well known how nominations are made—the clergy are disunited, and are too often accused by persons of the same nationality and ecclesiastical academies are far from being in a position to form a body of independent members of the Church. The instructions given them is miserably defective and, consequently they have no principles to guide their understanding their mission. Also, being certain that the Government will not support the clergy too often disregard their authority, and thus an archbishop may be insulted by a priest who is his inferior, because on the one side he has to contend against the Government, and on the other against his own clergy. It is precisely true that the present worthy archbishop is not a Pole, but a Russian, and this is against him in the eyes of the Government. The instructions given to

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND REPUBLICAN LIBERTY.

In an article printed recently by one of our daily contemporaries, which we had occasion to discuss in our columns, it was asserted, inferentially, that the Catholic Church was a power, and always had been, hostile to republican liberty. Charges like this are very readily brought by persons who would shrink from a thorough investigation into their correctness as a work involving too much labor. They are couched in general terms; they are not based upon any specific facts, and, consequently, a strictly logical refutation is almost an impossibility. The only practical way of meeting them is to confront them with similar assertions on the other side, and thus throw the burden of proof on the party making the charge. But the misfortune is that the proof will never be attempted, and that the accusers rest contented with repeating their allegations, being thoroughly satisfied that a large number of persons will be only too happy to take them without any further evidence. This is so true that it is safe for us to say most of the current accusations against the Catholic Church are simply the creation of fanaticism or prejudice, and are altogether destitute of foundation in fact. They are powerful and affect men's minds, for the sole reason that so few are conscientious enough or painstaking enough to trace them to their origin.

Many of the charges most frequently made are so strangely untrue and so directly opposed to the very essence of Catholicism, that small, indeed, is the amount of scrutiny necessary to expose their falsehood. Among them there is none more absurd or baseless than that which declares the Church to be the enemy of liberty. It will, we suppose, be granted by all that it is absurd to imagine any Church, body, or organization persistently and on principle opposed to its own best interests. It is simply monstrous and unnatural. Yet that is precisely what is involved in the charge alluded to. What has the Catholic Church to expect from monarchy or from servitude that it cannot obtain from republicanism and freedom? Nothing whatsoever. On the contrary, there are several important matters which it can readily procure from an enlightened Government and a free people which are absolutely unattainable under any form of despotism. Let us look at the condition of Europe at the present time, and ask ourselves whether it is more favorable to Catholicity than is the state of affairs in America.

England is generally admitted to be the freest and most liberal nation subjected to monarchical government. Yet Catholics are by law prevented from holding certain offices under the crown, and all the forces of public opinion cannot compel the Ministry to grant a charter to a Catholic University. It requires constant agitation and vigilance to procure for priests permission to visit and convey the consolations of religion to the members of their flock who are in Government institutions. Her Majesty's advisers think it a reproach to be even accused of giving the slightest encouragement to Catholic opinion in any shape or on any subject. Surely the Catholic Church cannot have much affection for a monarchy of this kind. While France was under imperial rule the clergy enjoyed even less liberty than their brethren in England. A parish priest could not hold his bishop's pastoral, and a bishop could not publish a communication from Rome without running the risk of interference by some petty official. The political requirements of the day were made to dictate the course of ecclesiastical discipline, and consequently the hierarchy were incessantly thwarted in the discharge of their duties. Certainly the Catholic Church had no reason to be favorable to the Napoleonic régime.

In Italy we find a still more deplorable state of affairs. The supreme head of the Church is despoiled of his legitimate sovereignty. Monks and nuns are driven from their monasteries and convents, robbed of their property, and then insulted by the proffer of a beggarly pittance, which is by sure not to be paid. The press teems with furious diatribes against the Church, and demagogues of the lowest kind are encouraged to perpetrate the grossest outrages upon the priestly order. In Germany, Bismarck has expelled the Jesuits, and has taken the control of ecclesiastical affairs almost completely out of the hands of the clergy and religious Orders. He even ventures to lay down whom the faithful shall or shall not recognize as their pastors, and to be practically interdicted all communication with the Holy See. Austria has not yet gone so far as this, but she is progressing on the same road, and can hardly fail to reach the same goal. Bavaria is in the leading-strings of Prussia. Belgium is run altogether in the interests of Freemasons and free-thinkers; so also is Portugal, and consequently the Church has much to suffer in both countries. Spain is in such confusion that it is not easy to understand what the position of Catholicity is now, but in the time of ISABELLA it had much reason to complain of Government interference. There is hardly necessity to speak of Russia; the persecution which the Poles are suffering on account of their faith tells sufficient of the respect paid to the Church in that quarter.

We have now enumerated the principal nations of Europe and have shown that in not a single one of them, Catholic or Protestant, is the Church left at peace or free from Government interference of one kind or another. And there never was a time in which it was really free. All through history emperors, kings and princes endeavored to get it into their power and control it in some way. All the concordats which we read of, and out of which such terrible things are edited by Protestant writers, were merely treaties by which the Pope secured a certain amount of liberty for the Church in return for certain specified privileges. Now here in America the Church is entirely free from Government supervision. No one thinks of subjecting the Pope's letters or Encyclicals to the scrutiny of the Secretary of State before they are published. President GRANT does not pretend to dictate who shall occupy the American bishoprics as they become vacant. Neither State nor Federal authorities claim to have a voice in the appointment of parish priests nor in drawing the boundaries of their parishes. The law protects the Church in its internal government and maintenance of discipline. All the obstacles that it has to contend with lie in the bigotry and ignorance of certain classes of the community; but these were not called into existence by law, nor can they be removed by it. We have endeavored to overcome them in due time by fair argument and the invincible force of truth.

Now we have only one question to ask, and it is this: Taking all the circumstances into consideration, which is the most likely and the most natural that the Catholic Church should favor, monarchy, or republicanism as it exists in this country? Why, in a plain and patent as anything can be that Catholicity will thrive best under a free Government, where the consciences of men are not subjected to restraint. Of course the Church cannot undertake the work of revolutionists and try to subvert Governments, so it will rather suffer persecution under a monarchy than sanction violent disturbance of society. Nor can it countenance the theories of so-called republicans who do not know what they are aiming at and have no fixed principles of Christian morality. It cannot encourage men who openly declare that Christianity ought to be abolished, that property is a theft, that the marriage tie is an infamy, and who seek to establish socialistic despotism. But it loves freedom, and wherever it germinates into institutions, as most favorable to its development and best suited to promote the welfare of mankind.

A Chess-room Colloquy.

An interesting colloquy took place in the chess room of that Mutual Admiration Society known by courtesy as the Mercantile Library Association, a short time since, out of which a change-player forebines us with the following synopsis:

Mr. A.—How deplorable it is to see the Catholic nations immersed in such ignorance! Almost! They are the best educated nations of Europe!

Mr. A.—Yes, on the principle that ignorance is bliss!

Mr. B.—I am serious in what I say.

Mr. A.—You don't mean to assert that the people of Italy are as well educated as the people of England, or that the youth of Rome were as well provided with educational facilities as those of Berlin!

Mr. B.—That's precisely what I do mean, and am willing to extend the comparison to all so-called Protestant and Catholic nations, and if you have ten hundred dollars to spare, I will bet five hundred dollars against them, that the so-called Catholic nations possess better educational facilities than those called Protestant, and not one half the ignorance.

Mr. A. (with a sneer)—You must be a Catholic, and deceived by the bigotry of your priests!

Mr. B.—If I were a good Catholic I would not be a member of this association. Your Puritan blindness excludes Catholic books and shuts the door against hundreds of the best educators of San Francisco. I never was a Catholic, and in proof that I am independent of all religions, I assure you that I have not entered the door of any church in twenty years; but if you are prepared to take my bet, I am prepared to prove my assertions by Protestant authors on the shelves of this library.

Mr. C.—Do you mean to include the United States!

Mr. B.—No. The United States are neither Catholic nor Protestant. Catholicism first discovered it, first taught the religion of Christ in it, first proclaimed freedom in it, and, despite your centuries of persecution, it is the most conservative, devoted and successful religious denomination in this country to-day.

Mr. A.—Is not the Church of the American people. Its members are foreigners.

Mr. B.—A census would prove you to be egregiously mistaken. But be that as it may, a generation has not yet passed since the Yankee school system was adopted by States outside of New England; nor will two generations more have passed when you will not have men enough to build your houses or cultivate your farms, nor young women fit to be wives. Shut out the foreigner—prescribe the foreign Church, as you call it, and you will become the most degraded nation, morally and physically, under the sun.

Here the conversation took a turlup turn, which we cannot follow, but the bet was not taken.

THE NEZ PERCES Indians refuse to go on the reservation selected for them by Government. There is something radically wrong in the reservation system, when the "nation's wards" have such a universal objection to reside thereon.

The O. U. A. M. an Anti-Catholic Association.

As we have all along suspected, the Order of United American Mechanics—of which there are two or three lodges in this city—is an anti-Catholic association. It will be remembered that in our exposé of the A. P. A., a communication appeared from the O. A. C. M., asking cooperation at the then approaching State election against the "Pope's body-guard," as the nominees professing the Catholic religion were styled. So insolent and arrogant have the O. U. A. M. become in Brooklyn, N. Y., that they recently passed a resolution calling on Dictator Burrows of that city to discharge six of his men because they are Roman Catholics, among them Captain Gill, his first deputy. Hon. Mr. Burrows, who, it appears, is a member of the Order, positively refused to do. The delegates next waited on him at his house and renewed the request, but with no better success. Were it possible for Catholics to make so outrageous a demand, the rostrum, the press and the pulpit throughout the land would ring with fierce denunciations against "Romanism;" yet they have not a word to say in reprobation of this proscriptive association. We have been furnished the names of prominent office-holders in San Francisco who belong to the A. P. A. and O. U. A. M., who are chiefly indebted to Catholics for their elevation—men whom few would suspect of proscriptive tendencies. Some of these sesk reelection at the hands of them in due time by fair argument and the invincible force of truth.

Now we have only one question to ask, and it is this: Taking all the circumstances into consideration, which is the most likely and the most natural that the Catholic Church should favor, monarchy, or republicanism as it exists in this country? Why, in a plain and patent as anything can be that Catholicity will thrive best under a free Government, where the consciences of men are not subjected to restraint. Of course the Church cannot undertake the work of revolutionists and try to subvert Governments, so it will rather suffer persecution under a monarchy than sanction violent disturbance of society. Nor can it countenance the theories of so-called republicans who do not know what they are aiming at and have no fixed principles of Christian morality. It cannot encourage men who openly declare that Christianity ought to be abolished, that property is a theft, that the marriage tie is an infamy, and who seek to establish socialistic despotism. But it loves freedom, and wherever it germinates into institutions, as most favorable to its development and best suited to promote the welfare of mankind.

LOCAL CATHOLIC ITEMS.

THE new church of the Holy Cross will be dedicated to-morrow week, Low Sunday, April 20th, by Most Rev. Archbishop Alemany, at half-past ten o'clock Mass. Thomas who knew the old St. Patrick's church would hardly recognize it in its present shape, so complete has been its metamorphosis. The outside shines in the refulgence of a handsome coat of white paint, while the inside is really beautiful. The alcove in which the altar is to be located is painted a fac simile of Siena marble, and the arch above is in sky blue, dotted with stars—a perfect illusion of the grand canopy of heaven. The pews are not yet built, but most of them will be between now and next Sunday. All in all, it is a handsome church, worthy of the zeal of Father Lagan, and the liberality of the parishioners.

ANOTHER DEDICATION.—We understand that the Most Rev. Archbishop will dedicate the new church of St. Dominic on Sunday, 25th of May, of which due notice will be given.

Holy Saturday and Easter Sunday.

HOLY SATURDAY.

To-day is known in the Christian Church as Holy Saturday. The burial of Christ, or rather Christ lying in the sepulchre among the dead, are the mysteries which ought this day to occupy our devotion.

EASTER SUNDAY.

The feast of Easter is the regulator of all the other great moveable festivals of the year, and always occupies the attention of the Church with the greatest solemnity, as the first among the five principal feasts of the Christian religion. The administration of the most holy Sacraments of Baptism and the Eucharist is performed on it with the utmost solemnity; and the Church commands all her children to receive the latter on that day, threatening those who refuse to do so with excommunication, so that a disobedience of this her precept is a sort of voluntary excommunication of one's self.

Worthy of Imitation.

The Irishmen of Manchester, N. H., took an unique and very excellent way to celebrate St. Patrick's day. Instead of spending labor and expending a considerable amount of money in holding a grand procession, the Irish people of that city this year devoted one day's pay to assist in the erection of the Catholic Hospital and Orphan Home. The traders of Irish descent gave the profits of the trade for the day for the same object. About ninety-five per cent. of the Irish operatives in the mills gave their day's pay, and it is thought that upwards of $5,000 were realized. This is a practical way of honoring the day, and to our mind, far more commendable than wasting time and money in useless displays. The money spent yearly in the United States by our Irish citizens and their families, if turned into a revolutionary fund, would, in five years, give the natives of "ould" to a liberating army; or would be available for any purpose that might be deemed advisable to devote it to.

THE ADMINISTRATION has often been credited with remarkable unsgacity in not procuring Jeff. Davis for the part he took in the rebellion. It now turns out that it was not magnanimity at all, but is attributable to the fact that the laws of the United States are not so comprehensive as to afford any certainty of punishing high treason or rebellion, and that Davis could not be convicted under them. This conclusion was arrived at by a council of the most legal lights of the country, held at Washington, some months after Davis' arrest. Among those present were Attorney-General Speed, Judge Clifford (of Massachusetts, we suppose; not he of the United States Court), Wm. Evarts and some half a ... ers, selected from the whole range of the Northern bench and bar, for their great legal ability. Many months were consumed in the matter deliberated, and the result was an abandonment of the idea of a prosecution.

THE Rev. J. P. Newman, D. D., late Chaplain of the United States Senate, has been appointed by President Grant "inspector of Indian affairs, with a salary of some $15,000, in addition to all traveling expenses. This is a new office—one of the President's special creation. It is unknown to the law; yet the President, of his individual volition, creates it, and appoints a prominent member of one of the sects—a person noted for nothing outside his services in his own particular denomination—to the position. We discover nothing in anything, in mute worse taste on the part of the Executive, except it be the appointment of his blood relations, regardless of fitness to the rich offices.

A SAD state of affairs exists at the asylum for the deaf, dumb and blind, near Oakland. Half fool, incompetent teachers, immoded behavior; and, to cap the infamy, improper relations are publicly charged to have been maintained for many months between some of the afflicted pupils and the employés, one of the latter being a nephew of the Superintendent, Warring Wilkinson. And yet the Superintendent is retained!

E. A. MARCHANT, a bill collector of this city, was fatally shot on Thursday afternoon of this week, by a man named John Saunders, a farmer, residing near Concord, Contra Costa county. One statement of the cause of the shooting is that Marchant seduced Saunders' young daughter, while another is that he defrauded Saunders in some money transactions. The first report is the one generally believed. Both men are well advanced in life, Marchant extended indefinitely, and thus a vacancy be created for Cols.

T. P. WELCH, of Third street, is the best bill poster in San Francisco. Here you can get scraps of the vintage of 1860, beautiful dis. vintage of 1870, as well as Daly's generous Cork Whiskey and finished genuine Irish Porter.

NEW IRELAND AND NEW ENGLAND.

Richard McCulloch, Esq., of Hartford, in his lecture in Norwich, Conn., on the evening of March 17th, gave some interesting facts regarding the increase in population and strength of the Irish race and blood in New England, and argued that the six States now called New England should be called Ireland. He said:

Captain John Smith, in 1614, upon visiting what is now called Massachusetts, named this section of the American continent New England, in compliment to old England; but long before Captain John Smith was born, or Columbus, either, an Irishman from the county of Kerry—St. Brendan, discovered it, with the rest of the Continent, and named it Ireland-ek-Mikla, or Great Ireland. This, according to Irish annals, corroborated by Scandinavian history, took place about the year A. D. 550. But as the Irish at the time were busy at home, and were governed by their own kings, they had no desire to populate a foreign country, and neglected their possessions. But after the lapse of their ten hundred years the descendants of St. Brendan have returned. They have been coming over for some years at a rapid rate, and are now steadily increasing in numbers that we call upon the map-makers and compilers of geography to call this part of the United States New Ireland.

The census of 1870, just come to hand, informs us there are here 30,626 persons born in England residing in the six States known as New England; and in these six States are 300,000 persons who have come from Ireland, while of Irish parentage there are 600,000 more, making in round numbers say one million people in New England born in Ireland and of Irish parentage. Of descendants of Irish there must be at least 500,000. The total population of the six States is 3,487,924, so about half the population of New England in 1870 was of Irish blood, and in 1873 the race is in the act of Pisgah the remainder of the population is by no means of English blood, for the Germans and Scandinavians are a large and growing part of the people. As Ireland, by historical precedent, is the mother country, we must have to theories of the public school system. No sane reason that we can ever could see, why the Bible in the public schools has always been the bone of contention. Nevertheless, the reason may be sufficiently enough; but our Protestant Bible is not the Bible of the Hebrew nor of the Greeks. The teacher who reads to any select from the New Testament to their scholars, or read disputed matter to Catholic pupils. Now, while all this may be very gratifying to men of stem and fighting Irish blood, it is not to the point to say that, adhering to that faith as we always have done, and as we always expect to do, we yet believe that theirs is no reason and justice to such a course.

Now, briefly to say, we submit it would be much more satisfactory to Protestants, Hugenots, Methodists, Episcopalians, the Friends, Unitarians, etc., to abolish and manage their own schools, if they can, and not force their views on the school fund. For a time the denominational schools were attended only by the Irish, but now all classes are sent to them, as the gradually diffused a feeling of irreligion, which, besides its other evils, disembes what we now see the most of men are—only places for the worship of Mammon, and Sunday is their race day.

What a change in a quarter of a century! In Rhode Island and Connecticut in 1844 there were but six priests, eight churches, and 8,997 Catholic souls. There are now over 100 churches, besides 64 chapels and stations, 85 priests, 70 clerical students, 19 male and female religious Orders, 11 academies, 10 parochial schools, 10 male and female academies, 41 parochial schools, 3 orphan asylums, 1 hospital, and 1 House of Industry, and 300,000 Catholics; so that at the same time stand upon your rights as American citizens. In the words of Father Tom Burke, "the subject, in industry, in manly self-respect, in honest pride of every thing that an honest man ought to be proud of—in all these, and in respect for the rights of this mighty country, lies the secret of the strength and of the national greatness, purely. Mark my words! Let Ireland in America be fulfilled, be Catholic, be practical, be temperate, be industrious, be content to the laws, and the day will dawn, sir, when the Irish race will be the great race—the first class to the top of the mountain, the Pagets sawmill. From this position they will look down upon the rest of the world on the ground or hills over which they have passed in the struggle, and thence the road will fork, one going west by south, to Davenport's Bar, and the other, continued on the already graded, to the Adams time-keeper by Davis & Cowell's Powder Mills. The latter road will be widened and made so as to be declared a county road by the Board of Supervisors. Our State friends must have lost faith in the Central Pacific Railroad project wagon road or above character.

SAFETY OF RAILROAD CROSSINGS.—Pennsylvania Railroad Company has made arrangements with the city of Pittsburg which the railway track is to be carried on an elevated structure, or the streets, or over them at such a height as to get out of the way of teams and pedestrians. The track is now level across on a level with the streets. The cost of this improvement will be not less than a million of dollars. The company will be largely benefitted not only by the additional safety and work whatever vexing delays in business. There will be no more delays in trains; trains will cross from one side to the city to the other at all hours, and crossings will at all times be clear of obstructions. It is estimated that the improvement so that all the through transportation will be under the city streets, leaving the surface of the city tracks on the same level as streets, as in England, we believe, no railroad crossings on the same level of street or public road.

THE REBELLION OF

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

Meanwhile the alarm of the citizens had subsided; the report which had caused them such consternation had originated in a threat of Pave, which it is believed he would have carried into effect but for the timely arrival of Sir Oliver Flemyng; and the latter's intimate shot from the barbican dismounting one of the rebel guns, and a second becoming unfit for present use by over frequent firing, the breaching operation went on less vigorously; and from the slight impression hitherto made upon the battered wall, from which a projecting turret only had been beaten, and from the great depth of the ditch, and strength of the inner defenses, the hopes of the citizens began to rise, and much less anxiety was exhibited than in the earlier part of the day. But that were battles or sieges to the vast that were now riding through the green alleys of Glasnevin?—for Talbot, who knew the country well, preferred the less frequented road by the interior. War and its tumults had no part in them; their hearts were calm; for a settled confidence in the fortunate result of their appeal, while it kept them observful in the mutual consciousness of minds at ease, left them without occasion to allude to any of those late trials or afflictions which each knew that the other hoped to remember only as the future contrast of many a bright day of happiness and honor. And yet their converse could not but be touched by the uniform melancholy of all the events in which they had lately borne so great part; and although their hearts were lightened of a great part of their burdens, and their words no longer had to struggle with the painfully familiar emotions of actual bereavement, disappointment or violent injury undeserved, what they said, after their conversation turned upon themselves, was, for the most part, characterized by a quiet tenderness, that neither rose above the animation of hope nor sunk below the confidential repose of satisfied expectation. They were all the world to one another; but theirs had been a world of sorrow, and their scarce sought for different attributes in the breasts for each had taken for that world's substitute; yet, mournful as their spoken communion was, the summer evening never fell on two more satisfied young creatures going out upon a world of care and trouble in the pride of their hearts' conscious strength and affection—two feelings mein chastened by suffering, or more tenderly yet firmly endeared by mutual support in its endurance. God help them! —it was sweet to see the considerate delicacy with which each would conceal the severer riveting recollection of their misfortune; not but that each knew well what bitter memories there must be in the other's breast, but these remembrances they felt were sealer to be borne with when both were so mutually conscious of a common grief.

Talbot, as often as he would look at his unwonted dress or equipage—poor Ellen, at every return from abstractions, frequently as full of mournful associations as the restless themselves around her, would sigh to think of the severe fate which neither would lament, lest the other should know that both were its victims. Keenly did the unfortunate knight feel his exclusion from the society of the numerous friends and relatives whose callus or strengths of various kinds they possessed so frequently upon their way. At no place did it strike him with a sharper pang than on the next day, when, as they rode within view of the tower of Athlone, at a little distance among the woods, it began to rain violently, and he found that he had unconsciously turned lives like its own in every man's breast, than on any well-pondered consideration of the case, and who, in truth, had not been thinking of what was to be done so much as of what had already happened, was ill-prepared for such a question. "By my honor, Ellen, I did not think of that; but surely Cromer would not take advantage of a man coming voluntarily before him in his own defence. A single suspicion of danger, as I am a gentleman, never entered my mind; but now we are close to the monster; danger or no danger, I cannot hesitate now."

"But if there be danger, we must hesitate," said Ellen, with affectionate firmness. "Oh you think that the prisoner would suffer your company to proceed in confidence by him of your innocence?"

"I vow, I hardly know what to think; if I went to him as his penitent—"

"He would not receive your confession; you must appeal to him as his prisoner."

"What, not receive my confession—how could he refuse?"

"Alas, dear John, you are not now like others. It pains my heart to put you in mind of the awful difference there is between your state to-day and when you came to Patrick's church yesterday morning."

"Ah," he cried, suddenly remembering that he was now without the pale of the Catholic Church, and could claim no right or privilege of a Christian—"ah, I had forgotten; but no matter, I will go to him as an innocent man, I care not—Ah, Ellen, but for your sake, I would bravado, I care not what chances it."

"For my sake, then," said she, "do not go; I have felt that good would not come of it if you did, ever since we came in sight of the place—I will go myself; I know all that you could say from beginning to end, dear John, let me plead your cause; believe me, I am so satisfied of its truth, that I cannot fail. You have told me every circumstance I am sure—but, is there anything else that you remember since we spoke about it last?"

"Nothing, dear Ellen, I have told you my heart, and you have read it—confess it, but by my hand, it makes me blush to think that after coming so far, I should shrink thus on the very threshold—I have never thought, Ellen, that I should live to see the time when I should be afraid to send you where I fear to go myself."

"Dearest, for you there is no danger, however it may go; but I would be loath to both if you should go and fall. Here we will alight; now let me laugh to see you play the valet—come Master-ellen, hold me my horse here outside the gates, and I will go in myself—Nay, dear love, take care that you do not betray yourself."

He pressed her hand in silence, for they dared not clumsily themselves with an embrace; and the devoted girl walked forward to the monastery. Shame and admiration held divided sway for a moment in the breast of Talbot; but when he saw Ellen, after making solemnity of a monk at the gates, go in alone, his heart rose indignant at it own cowardice, and he followed her.

"Where is the archbishop?" he demanded of the porter.

"His lordship is walking with the abbot; he here presently; your lady's suite is coming in the meantime, Talbot, advanced a step, and beheld Ellen kneeling at the foot of the great stone cross to the right of the monastery; the rich light made all its sculptured figures stand out in warm relief, save where her shadow fell on the foot of the shaft, as she knelt, with folded hands and bowed head, awaiting her husband's and her own fate. He would not look at such a sight without feeling that he was a fitter penitent for it—"I will not disturb her," he said, and walked back, and he came in his cause in her hands. Ellen, unconscious of the lapse of any momentary observation, continued kneeling for several minutes after her husband's return, her expectation of the archbishop's coming had, perhaps, mingled more human anxiety with her supplication for the divine protection and support; but she should have wished to accompany her appeal to the seat of mercy; but ere long she felt her heart penetrated with feelings of unmixed devotion, and now knelt absorbed in earnest prayer, as motionless in the calm evening light as the figures carved upon the stone before her. She was aroused from the sweet and relieving communion of an innocent heart reposing with full reliance on the goodness of God by a "benedicite," pronounced in a mild tone by some one at her side. She rose, and saw the archbishop before her—for that was the title previously known his person, but the dignity of the prelate's appearance was a sufficient indication of his exalted rank.

"Bless you, daughter," he said, and Ellen bowed her head low under the benediction; "your hand been asking one, sing, if they would—and heart be in accordance, will not be slow to hear the supplication. The sorrowful faith told me thou wouldst speak with me."

"My lord," said Ellen, rising—and she looked, in order to think of some preface to her story, but her heart had no room for any thought save the one, and she could not avoid the abruptness with which she began to address him—"My lord, I have come from Dublin to appeal to your lordship on behalf of a widow murdered—but one again stopped short, confused to think how strange must her interest in an errand must appear to one who did not know in what relation she stood by him whom she thus undertook to defend.

"Is it thy father, my child?" asked the archbishop, willing to relieve her embarrassment by a question to which he anticipated a negative reply.

"Alas, no, my lord, my father is dead."

"We must all die," said the considerate old man, still willing to give her time; "and thy father, my child, has not gone before us who was he?"

"My lord, my father was a merchant well-known in Dublin—Paul Dudley, of the Wharf."

"What, the loyal alderman who led the sally against the rebels at Kilmainham?"

"Alas, yes, my lord; and was slain in the retreat through Saint Patrick's Well."

"Ah, the brave old man! I knew him but by sight, but his name ever came to my ears joined with esteem and honor. And thou, my daughter, art thou left alone in the world by this sad event?"

"My lord, if it pleases you, my better husband's death I had long been betrothed to a gentleman and, my lord, to whom I think he was dying he sanctioned what we have done—we were married in Dublin yesterday."

"That was somewhat the soonest after a father's death," said Cromer, gravely.

"Indeed, my lord, I would fain have deferred it," replied Ellen: "but when your lordship hears our story, you will not so much blame us."

"I am not one to seek for cause of blame against any man," replied the archbishop "but why do I see one so short a time a bride lamenting here among strangers? Where is thy husband?"

"My lord, it is upon his—It is upon my husband's behalf, that I come; he is that unfortunate knight, Sir John Talbot."

The archbishop started, and took a paper hurriedly from his breast; he cast a single glance at it, and folded it again; but his hands shook as he put it up, and his placid features grew flushed with sudden emotion. Ellen stood trembling, for she was confounded to find that what she doubted not was the news of Alan's murder was already before her. The archbishop was the first to speak.

"I fear me much, young woman, this marriages will stand strongly against the good of thy suit. But then come to look for absolution? Wouldst thou seek to have the unholy vows dispensed?"

"I crave, my lord, if it please you, for redress," she replied, and her heart gratefully acknowledged its returning strength. "My husband had no part in the crime with which they charge him, and I come to implore your lordship to aid me in saving that dreadful curse which they have unjustly pronounced against him remitted, but not recalled even by him, my lord, for he is an innocent and a true man, and I would not desert him though they wronged him even unless as much as they have done."

"Alas," said the archbishop, "this is but the fondness of an over trusting heart; none but a young bride in her honeymoon could ever think as in the face of these undeniable proofs. Why, child, he is caught in the very act and acknowledgment of the bloody sacrilege. Ah, he must be a crue and impious man! Heaven pardon me if I here too ill an opinion of my murdered brother; but, hark thou! I fear he was, sure enough to make every priest of the Christian Church shudder to the core at the most hateful and heathenish butchery. Young woman, thou must not share the bed of an excommunicated man!"

Ellen's heart failed her a second time, and she felt her limbs grow cold as she saw her as she saw with what a strength of conviction she had to contend. She leaned against the side of the cross immediately for an instant of the nature of her support, and, in raising her eyes to answer, they unconsciously rested upon the sculpture of the crucifixion, and she grasped it as a support. With such a divine, impulse, that came from both at the same moment, she replied again. "Oh, my Lord," she cried, "it was to shrift you hear our story. Alas, I am but only one of the weak sex, but I tell your lordship aught save that which I believe in my soul to be the unhappy knight's Lord, I am ashamed of myself that I could believe you would suspect me of saying an untruth, and here—here of all places in the world—Forgive me the imprecation—but if this holy sign of our salvation were to fall and crush me where I stand, it would be a slight punishment compared with what I should merit if I dare not retract anything I uttered in any part of all that I know to the matter of my husband's accusation. Good my Lord, hear me; in the name of Him who died on the great cross, hear our story, and judge as mercifully—"

The archbishop's countenance had lost its severity, and there now came a cast of consideration and pause over it, which Ellen's tears, as they rolled down her cheeks, seemed to soften. "I do not know what to think, my child; I would be slow to believe you, and yet all that has transpired against the unfortunate knight is so confirmed by his own confession, that I cannot but think the mistress; and from my soul I pity thee, and pray the same great Bishop of all our souls to give thy heart aright in the trial that awaits thee."

"Then, my lord," said Ellen, "with thanks and blessing I will place that widow's heart before Heaven and you," and she proceeded, with earnest minuteness, to detail all that had happened to herself, and all that she had heard from Talbot, from the morning of the execution to the time of her interview with the archbishop. Her voice faltered for a great part of the time, but as she came to each remaining circumstance in her husband's innocence, she ventured to raise them to the face of the prisoner, and from that moment every fear of her own fate, and even of her husband's, was forgotten in the deep interest she felt in the success of her appeal. Her self-possession returned gradually to her, and she spoke with a clearness and precision that astonished herself, and which, she thought, must have astonished the archbishop, who listened with a countenance of the deepest attention, and who, when she had concluded, remained silent for several minutes, as if in deep consideration.

"Alas," said the archbishop, "this is a strange story, and I fear me much that the fondness of an over trusting heart; none but a young bride in her honeymoon could ever think as in the face of these undeniable proofs. Why, child, is it caught in the very act and acknowledgment of the bloody sacrilege. Ah, he must be a cruel

Mr. T. H. L. Corry, M. P. for Tyrone, died lately at Bournemouth, England. He was one of the old-at members of the House of Commons, and sat for Tyrone for no less a period than forty-seven years. The secretary to the National Teachers' Central Association has received a letter from Cardinal Cullen's secretary, stating that his Eminence has seen the new memorandum of agreement signed by the National Board, and considers it quite satisfactory, all the obnoxious clauses to which exception could be taken on religious grounds having been removed. Hence no more opposition will be made to it by the Cardinal or the Bishops.

"I have to congratulate you on the satisfactory and peaceful state of your county." "The state of your county leaves nothing to be desired." "There are only a few trifling cases to go before you." Such are the terms in which the Irish judges are just now addressing the Grand Juries of Ireland. In Clare there were only three or four cases for trial; in Limerick not many more; in Meath three in Carlow twelve of a very trivial character indeed; in the North Riding of Tipperary absolutely none at all. And we may reasonably suppose that the same monotonous story will be repeated to the end of the chapter. Ireland has been almost entirely free from serious crime since the Summer Assizes.

A Marine Monster.

The London Daily Telegraph gives an interesting description of the new English war ship Devastation: That the Devastation is a great success, so far as she has been tried, is now admitted. She is a powerful monster, which spuns upon the astonished waters with a dead weight of ten thousand tons, takes any ordinary waves with sinful indifference, whether they overthrow them end on, or upon bow, beam or quarter, and prodigious hill of foam which her stem piles up when under way, washes, as was expected, clean over her forward deck, and she is often submerged aft; but her decks and midsection rides quietly through the storm on board her we are sheltered by the rolling of the sea, nay that she was steadier than many horse ashore. She turns with great readiness and in a small circle, and her speed as proved in six trials along the measured mile, is not only equal to the promise of her designers, but it exceeds expectation.

The mighty engines driving this island of iron with an indicated power of 6,000 horses, with seventy-seven revolutions to the minute, go fifteen knots and a half out of hankrip, and her mean rate at full steam is thirteen knots and three-quarters. Here, therefore, is a craft which is vulnerable only in a very few guns, has the swiftness of a small packet, and the handiness—thanks to her twin screws—of a tug, while she could utilize the qualities to hurl upon an opponent the awful force of all her 10,000 tons, moving with the velocity of a spent. On board this remarkable man-of-war there are no less than thirty four distinct and separate engines, and, indeed, the value which she represents is as serious as her fighting capacity. What remains to be learned is the behavior of the ugly giant in a real Bisay gale, and whether or no the cul-de-sac which she carries aft will not prove a mistake in a heavy flowing sea.

With a facility assured by long tea-drees, with no top gear to set her over, and with decks which can be hermetically closed, she would be strongly inclined to, whenever she does roll, or pitch or scud, the rivets or fittings of her huge body will be thoroughly tried. Except the Russian monitor, Peter the Great, nothing floating could resist or even challenge such a vessel, at once so strong and swift. The torpedo, no doubt, may yet be so developed as to assail the Devastation and all her terrible sisters important against a defended coast. On the high sea, at present, she has no superior, though, we suppose the day will come when even this amazing Devastation will be as obsolete as the three-deckers of Nelson.

Terrible Calamity in Rochester.

ROCHESTER (N. Y.) April 8.—About 8 o'clock this evening the wall of the new police building being erected on Front street, near the Genesee river, gave way, carrying fifteen or twenty men who were standing on it watching the river. Seven of these were rescued. The others are believed to have perished as they were last seen going under the bridge and being swiftly carried by the current. The water is reported to have seen feet deep in the cellar of the building. It is therefore impossible to excavate, although it is believed some of the victims are buried among the ruins. The river is rising at the rate of one foot per hour. One of the men in the pens is a negro girl—raised in the Asylum for the Deaf and Dumb at Boulogne, near Orleans—who has been missing until the 11th of October current.

Plenty from Which to Choose.

Truly blessed and fruitful—particularly fruitful—has been the Protestantism of England! Where and when will the subdivider of its divisions and subdivisions and sections and subsections have an ending? If ever Church were characterized by that unity which is said to be the peculiarity of that true Church which the Saviour set up upon earth to establish, it can hardly be said to be the one which has had for its origin the licentiousness of that notable defender of the faith, Henry VIII. Can there possibly be anything more lamentably ridiculous than the religious attitude of the Protestantism and dissent of England of the present day? What with Congregationalists, Baptists, Wesleyans, Primitive Methodists, New Connection Methodists, Bible Christians, Methodist Episcopalians, Bible Christians, Free Church, Low Church, Middle Church, Ritualistic, Episcopalians, Church of England, Christadelphians, Shakers, Ranters, Howling Dervishians, Jumpers, Peculiars and other offshoots of Protestantism, for one, we thought that the lamentable effects of the national falling off from the true faith had gone to its full extreme. It is not so. There are two more dissenting sects to be added on to the long list. They have styled themselves the New Jerusalemites and the Swedenborgians. They have just published at Canterbury has presented petitions to the House of Lords from those two bodies in favor of marriage with a deceased wife's sister. A pity it is that his grace did not at the same time inform the world of the peculiar views of those two new branches of English Protestantism. What will the next Protestant novelty be?—Universe.

Population and Religious in Canada.

The census of the Dominion presents us, says the Montreal True Witness, with very ample details as to the relative number of the various religious denominations of whom the population is made up. The total population of the Dominion is set down at 3,491,761, of whom 1,190,815 belong to the Province of Ontario, 1,191,516 to the Province of Quebec; 285,594 to New Brunswick; and 387,836 to the Province of Nova Scotia. We have the subjoined religious statistics: Christians, 3,460,317; Jews, 1,115; Mahommedans, 13; Pagans, 1,315. The ratio for marriage and to inhabitants for the whole Dominion is 1 in 135.

The Christian population is composed of 1,492,029 Catholics. Of these 274,192, are residents of Ontario; 1,010,850 of the Province of Quebec; 191,309 of New Brunswick; 102,600 of Nova Scotia. The Protestant population numbers 1,908,788—which are distributed among the Provinces as follows in different sects, arranged alphabetically:—Adventists, 1,240; Anglicans, 574,818; Baptists, 252,445; Congregationalists, 27,124; Disciples, 1,630; Evangelical Association, 1,631; Friends, 7,762; Lutherans, 81,351; Methodists, 499,142; Presbyterians, 729,633; Unitarians, 1,630; Universalists, 1,630; Various and undefined, 1,630; Without any religious profession, 22,630.

The Catholic population is subdivided as follows:—Irish, 1,030,000; French, 452,000; Germans, 12,000; Indians, 12,000; Mixed and other Irish and French, 12,000.

Extraordinary Charge.

Last week we gave the substance of Judge Lawson's extraordinary charge to the Grand Jury of Antrim. That charge was entirely conversant with the Belfast riots, and its most notable points were that the Catholic and national procession to and from Hannahstown was the origin of the subsequent disturbances; that that procession was seditious and unlawful; that it should never have been permitted, and that its promoters should have been returned for trial along with the actual rioters. "This armed body of seditious persons," he said, referring to the Hannahstown processionists, "was allowed to return in the evening to Belfast to parade their emblems of disloyalty, and to flaunt their banners before the eyes of the loyal and well disposed subjects of the Queen." It is surely no wonder after such a statement as this that the Orange organs are delighted, and the Catholic very indignant with Mr. Lawson.

The trial of those charged with various offenses arising out of the riots commenced on Monday. Several of those persons were convicted on that day and subsequently, a new jury having been acquitted, and a still smaller number put back till the next assizes in consequence of a disagreement of the jury; but in no case up to Wednesday night did the Judge pass sentence except one—the case of two Catholics who were found guilty on Tuesday of having compelled a man named Lane to quit his house in Lesson street, and who were sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. It is at least possible that in the case and in others the conviction will be quashed, as a challenge to the jury panel was handed in by Mr. Hugh, Q. C., M. P., and the question whether the challenge was sustained or not reserved for the Court of Criminal Appeal.

The packing of the assizes on the two Catholics under these circumstances drew from the Ulster Examiner some strong comments, and on Wednesday the counsel appearing the Crown in the Antrim Court House drew the attention of Judges Lawson to those comments as being "calculated to impede the course of justice"—in fact, as constituting a contempt of Court. The Judge, of course, praised the representative of the Crown for his vigilance, agreed with him in his opinion of the Examiner's articles, and ordered the responsible managers of that journal to appear before him on the following day, to answer for his conduct. Manifestly, Mr. Lawson is rapidly improving.—Nation, March 29.

Consecration of Ireland.

The consecration of Ireland to the Sacred Heart of our Divine Lord took place March 30th, and in reference thereto the following directions were issued by his Eminence Cardinal Cullen: "In preparation for this solemn consecration, a Triduum will be performed in all the churches and chapels of the diocese of Dublin on Thursday, 27th March, and the two following days, Friday and Saturday. It is to be hoped that the faithful will show their love for our Lord by approaching the Sacrament of penance and the Blessed Eucharist, and performing other works of penance or charity during the Triduum. It is requested that every priest will say a Mass in honor of the Sacred Heart within the Triduum, or on Passion Sunday, praying for the welfare of the Church, and begging of God to preserve our own country from infidelity, the natural result of that Godless education with which we are menaced, and to give us a sympathy which abounds in the hearts brought up in holiness and love of God, and in due subordination to the Catholic Church, the pillar and ground of truth. Prayers and exhortations will be delivered in every church or chapel by a Catholic clergyman, and sanctioned and considerable enthusiasm. Mr. Macnamara delivered an address which shows that that gentleman, unlike his supporters, has the flure of a good, popular speaker, and, if elected, will not be a dummy member. Further messages of a similar character to that which has been held in various parts of Tyrone to further Mr. Macartney's candidature, and there seems to be no doubt that he will receive a large accession to the support of the tenant voters.—Dublin Nation, March 29.

Visit of Father Burke to Tuam.

On St. Patrick's Day Father Burke paid a visit to his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam. After Mass the people assembled in crowds through the town, and with shamrocks in their hats and bonnets, and green neckties and ribbons, awaited the arrival of the Illustrious preacher, and the demonstrations which always follow in his appearance were manifested. An address from the laity and clergy of Tuam was presented, and an invitation to a public banquet in the Assembly Rooms was accepted. The President of St. Jarlath's College, and Mr. Cahill, were invited to dinner, when, in reply to the cheers which accompanied the drinking of his health, Father Burke said that he could not address interspersed and polished with wit and humor.—Catholic Opinion, March 29.

Illness of Archdeacon Murphy.

A most painful sensation was created at the Mass on Tuesday, at St. Patrick's, when it was announced that the Very Rev. Archdeacon Murphy, P.P., was confined to the residence of his friend, Mr. Sanders, of the Ordinance Survey Office, that the wonderful condition of the many-gifted man was a great source of anxiety to his friends, and that the sympathy of all would be extended to him in the hour of his affliction. An altar-boy ran for some water, but while he was gone the Archdeacon fell on his back on the altar steps. The congregation rose in a body and expressions of horror escaped from every side, many ladies nearly fainting. The Archdeacon was carried into the sacristy and in a scene of the greatest confusion. Medical aid was promptly sent for, and we are glad to learn from that the venerable Archdeacon's condition is improved. — Catholic Opinion, March 29.

Father O'Keeffe.

There is again a rumor that the unhappy difference between Father O'Keeffe of Callan and his ecclesiastical superior is "on the eve of a satisfactory settlement." The story as given in the Daily Express is, that "the Most Rev. Dr. Bower, formerly President of Maynooth College, intends to resign the Bishop of St. John's, Newfoundland, drove to an open carriage and pair to the Rev. Mr. O'Keeffe's Presbytery on Friday, and remained closeted with him for several hours." "An Italian O'Keeffe," adds the writer, "is rather reticent about the matter, so for low, no having alluded to his case in any way on Sunday, the matter is supposed by well informed parties to be an ex parte concept, or at all events on the brink of it.—Nation, March 29.

Christian Brothers, Cork.

At St. Mary's Cathedral, on Sunday, the annual appeal was made in behalf of the schools of the Christian Brothers in Cork, when a most influential assemblage of citizens was present, the congregation, including the Mayor, the City High Sheriff, Mr. Hayne, M. P. for the City, and most of the leading Catholic gentry. His Lordship, the Right Rev. Dr. Delany, presided. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. D. Slattery, O. P., St. Mary's, and was a very eloquent and powerful discourse upon the importance of sound Christian education for the people, combining religious with secular instruction. The Church collection realized £101 10s.; and donations were handed in amounting to £33 10s., which included £20 from Mr. William Abbott, stock broker, London, who had witnessed the recent examinations of the pupils and was greatly struck by the efficiency of the commercial class.—Catholic Opinion.

A Clerical Swindler.

What a splendid thing it would be for the Whalleyites and the Newdegateites of the land if they could manage to seduce a clergyman of the Catholic Church into placing himself into such a position as that in which the once well-to-do Rev. Vyvyan H. Moyle, who had been during the week sentenced to penal servitude for seven years, has succeeded in getting himself—not exactly into a convict—but into a sad and a dangerous muddle of society as to be consigned to penal servitude for seven years! What a rare notion, Mr. Newdegate! What a refreshing thing, Mr. Whalley! Nothing less than a royal commission of inquiry into the private lives of every Catholic clergyman in the kingdom would be really half sufficient one or the other of you, honorable gentlemen, would undertake to make out that, instead of being a Protestant clergyman, the Rev. Mr. Moyle was really a priest of the very deepest dye in the Church of Rome. But, unfortunately for yourselves and your demented cause, you can get no opportunity of doing this. What a telling motion, Mr. Newdegate! What a refreshing subject, Mr. Whalley! Nothing less than a royal commission of inquiry into the private lives of every Catholic clergyman in the kingdom would really half suffice

THE STIGMATA.

Our "live" contemporary, the Chronicle, discovering, we suppose, a fresh class "sensation" in the alleged appearance of the stigmata of the Redeemer on the hands and feet of Miss COLLINS, has gone into discussion of the affair after its peculiar fashion with considerable enthusiasm. We regret to say that we have much complaint to make, on behalf of candor and fair-play, as to the style in which the reputed phenomenon has been dealt with, as well as to the invidious insinuations hazarded against the character of the young lady, her family and her friends. Our contemporary makes many gratuitous assumptions, completely distorts facts or else ignores them and, of course, comes to conclusions wholly unwarranted by circumstances. All this is, however, only part and parcel of the plan usually adopted by secular newspapers when treating of matters appertaining directly or indirectly to Catholic faith, as we had occasion to remark in an article published a few weeks ago. Either through culpable ignorance or deliberate malice they attribute to the Church doctrines or practices not at all acknowledged by it, and while fraudulently assailing and overthrowing these, triumphantly ask their readers to behold how they are demolishing "the errors of Popery!" It is easy enough to gain victories in this way, but right-minded people will never attach much value to them.

Those who have read CHARLES DICKENS' powerful and dramatic noval, "The Old Curiosity Shop," will remember how that very amiable character, Mr. DANIEL QUILP, used to gratify his spleen against whoever offended him. His had in his office an old wooden figure-head, and identifying it to his mind with the object of his hatred, he proceeded upon certain occasions to belabor it with a stick, call it all sorts of names and abuse it to the utmost extent of his power. This strange behavior seemed to appease his fiendish malice almost as thoroughly as if he had had the persons he wished within his power. The utmost said has been that wounds, or marks of wounds, resembling those inflicted on our Saviour at the time of his crucifixion, appeared on the person of a young lady resident in this city, and that blood flowed therefrom. This was nothing more than the statement of a fact, which might have been verified in a moment by those who cared to do so. The wounds were there and they did bleed, to all intents and purposes—so much even the Chronicle does not deny, for they are matters of public notoriety. The questions as to their precise cause or origin are yet unsettled by any authority, and no statement has been made concerning them by those whose opinions are worth quoting. But our contemporary has been making tremendous efforts to create a controversy on the subject, alleging that a priest, or the priests, were resorting to fraud to spread the belief—absurd, according to it, in the nineteenth century—that a miracle had been wrought. To combat the idea of a miracle—put forward by itself alone, our readers must bear in mind—it has not hesitated to charge (by innuendo, worse and more offensive than direct assertion) Miss COLLINS with being an accomplice in the perpetration of an infamous fraud. The young lady is highly respectable, her conduct has always been above reproach, she has devoted herself to the holy mission of succoring the distressed and afflicted; so it is simply monstrous on the part of a journalist to coin such an accusation against her. There is not the slightest particle of evidence, or seeming evidence, to show that deception of any kind was perpetrated or even attempted by her, or by any one else with her connivance. The whole idea is an assumption, and a scandalously indecent one, too.

If the Chronicle were asked why it ventured to make these insinuations, it would probably answer that it had no belief in the possibility of miracles, and that sooner than admit one had occurred it would prefer believing in a collusion between Miss COLLINS and some other party or parties to pain off an imposture on the people. But would it not have been wise to have waited until the alleged phenomenon had openly been declared to be of a supernatural nature before having recourse to the rude expedient of crying out "FRAUD!" The Archbishop has not characterized the occurrence as miraculous. Father PRENDERGAST has contented himself with saying that the matter was to him strange and inexplicable. Few if any of the other Catholic clergy have pronounced any opinion whatever. All intelligent laymen withhold their judgment, awaiting scientific investigation and authoritative pronouncement. In, then, the Catholic Church, or its representatives here, to be held accountable for the chatter of idle women, the rumors of gossipers or the assertions of sensation-mongers? Of course the writer in the Chronicle is not aware of the rules of the Church applying to the investigation of reputed supernatural occurrences, for if he were he would not have penned the articles we are referring to. If he made the necessary inquiries he would learn that one of the very first obligations in such cases is the avoidance of publicity. Hence it happens that the Chronicle itself is responsible for the publication of the circumstances attending the manifestation of the stigmata on Miss COLLINS. The clergy did their best, as in duty bound, to keep the matter secret, and only spoke when silence would have laid the young lady's character open to imputations of an unpleasant nature. The next obligation is to get the sworn testimony of the eye-witnesses of the supposed miracle. After that comes the necessity of subjecting the matter, as far as possible, to the scrutiny of persons the most competent to pronounce whether or not it comes within the domain of natural phenomena. For, before any event can be classed as miraculous, each and every theory of accounting for it that can be derived from natural or physical causes must be acknowledged insufficient. And this is only right and proper, inasmuch as supernatural agencies can only come in where the ordinary laws that govern the material world are incompetent.

Now if these conditions were observed at all in the case affecting Miss COLLINS, they were only so to a very limited extent, owing to the peculiarity of the circumstances, which were not favorable to investigation. Consequently it would be inexcusable presumption for any one to declare the case to be a genuine miraculous, even if they were thoroughly satisfied that no such thing as fraud were possible. Moreover (we daresay this declaration will astonish the Chronicle), even if all possible investigation had been made, and the result was that the examiners were fully and perfectly satisfied that the laws of nature had been transcended, it would be a grave ecclesiastical offense, involving nothing less than the loss of sacerdotal powers, for any of them, no matter how high their dignity, to announce that a miracle had been performed. For our own part, while we admit that we have every reason to give credence to the facts of the case, yet, before ascribing them to supernatural agency, we are not at all sort of a dummy or lay-figure that it wants to pass off on unsuspecting public as a Catholic clergyman. Very little examination, however, is necessary to prove that our contemporary is afflicted with an "emotional insanity" similar in every respect to to that exhibited by DICKENS' hero. And the sole cause for such irrational conduct, so far as we are able to make one out, is an anxiety to maintain that a miracle has not possibly taken place in San Francisco!

We are not aware that any person, Catholic priest or Catholic layman, has given it the provocation of asserting that a miracle did occur in this case of the reported stigmata. The utmost said has been that wounds, or marks of wounds, resembling those inflicted on our Saviour at the time of his crucifixion, appeared on the person of a young lady resident in this city, and that blood flowed therefrom. This was nothing more than the statement of a fact, which might have been verified in a moment by those who cared to do so. The wounds were there and they did bleed, to all intents and purposes—so much even the Chronicle does not deny, for they are matters of public notoriety. The questions as to their precise cause or origin are yet unsettled by any authority, and no statement has been made concerning them by those whose opinions are worth quoting. But our contemporary has been making tremendous efforts to create a controversy on the subject, alleging that a priest, or the priests, were resorting to fraud to spread the belief—absurd, according to it, in the nineteenth century—that a miracle had been wrought. To combat the idea of a miracle—put forward by itself alone, our readers must bear in mind—it has not hesitated to charge (by innuendo, worse and more offensive than direct assertion) Miss COLLINS with being an accomplice in the perpetration of an infamous fraud. The young lady is highly respectable, her conduct has always been above reproach, she has devoted herself to the holy mission of succoring the distressed and afflicted; so it is simply monstrous on the part of a journalist to coin such an accusation against her. There is not the slightest particle of evidence, or seeming evidence, to show that deception of any kind was perpetrated or even attempted by her, or by any one else with her connivance. The whole idea is an assumption, and a scandalously indecent one, too.

If the Chronicle were asked why it ventured to make these insinuations, it would probably answer that it had no belief in the possibility of miracles, and that sooner than admit one had occurred it would prefer believing in a collusion between Miss COLLINS and some other party or parties to pain off an imposture on the people. But would it not have been wise to have waited until the alleged phenomenon had openly been declared to be of a supernatural nature before having recourse to the rude expedient of crying out "FRAUD!" The Archbishop has not characterized the occurrence as miraculous. Father PRENDERGAST has contented himself with saying that the matter was to him strange and inexplicable. Few if any of the other Catholic clergy have pronounced any opinion whatever. All intelligent laymen withhold their judgment, awaiting scientific investigation and authoritative pronouncement. Is

THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART FOURTH (continued.)

She burst into renewed grief, and lay on his breast, weeping as if her heart would break: then her hands, which had been resting on his, were gradually withdrawn, and she folded her arms round his neck silently, but with a supplicating tenderness that needed no words.

"Ellen," he said, "I will say it all then."

She raised her head, and resting it higher on his bosom, acknowledged the almost unhoped for boon with a tenderer caress, and with murmured thanks, that were half-inarticulate from the burst of former feeling scarce yet subdued.

"I will make another effort for your sake, Ellen," he continued. "I will go myself to some churchman and tell all; I would rather bear the worst they could inflict than see you suffering thus much longer. I was indeed a coward, and deserved the disappointment I met, to have done this sooner. Ellen, if I thought you could bear the journey, I would start for Templemore to-morrow; there is a convention of prelates there, among whom it will go hard with me if I cannot find some one that will listen to the truth. My father was a near friend of the Bishop of Meath, and he and Cromer are both there."

"Dear John, I could bear the journey quite well," she replied, drying her tears, and striving to speak more steadily; "we could go by easy stages; indeed I think it would be much the better of a little travelling. And you know," she resumed, "we were bound to remain here, or we would await the result of this charge against Master Harvey as well as Templemore or Castle-at-Armagh; the weather, too, is by no means severe, and, now that unhappy gentleman Lord Thomas is gone into Connaught, the roads will all be safe. Did you not say that all his troops in Leinster are shut up in garrison, while he has the main army with him beyond the Shannon?"

"It is indeed; and now I hear that Skeffington, our new lord deputy—he whom they call William the Conqueror—is landing with a force of rebellion, I fear, is near a close."

"But has he not still a great army, and many castles?"

"Should O'Connor, as they report, have joined him, his army will be a powerful one; and his garrison certainly hold the six principal castles in Leinster. There is Maynooth and Portlester, and above all, Maynooth which they say he has fortified so strongly, that it is said to be impregnable."

"All does he command there still?"

"What Parse? Yes; the villain remains yet unhanged. I hear, too, he has a choice garrison; but I believe they keep close to their walls; we would not have to pass within twenty miles of them."

"Oh, John, forbid that we should fall into his hands! But surely there would be no danger of that?"

"Once in the world; we would hold our own, dear Joan, if—" he spoke—"we could do it clear for the fatigue. You could not leave it behind; and am sure I would rather travel a hundred miles than live another day, without some effort to avert such misery."

"And, dear Ellen, why did you not tell me sooner?"

"Alas! I can scarce tell why; but I had hopes that every day would bring us some change for the better, and I hardly thought that you would wish to make so hazardous an attempt as we could then undertake. I believe it was chiefly because I feared you would think my apprehensions groundless and unworthy of serious attention; for I know how little you regard the Church's censure in comparison with me."

"Indeed, dear Ellen, what I regard the most now is your peace of mind, and whatever makes you unhappy is hateful to me. I know you could not shake off this dread, superstitious as it may be, or you would have done so; and therefore, dear Ellen, we will bid farewell to Armagh to-morrow, and take our chance of getting safely to Templemore, where, I trust in God, our suit may speed better than it did at Monasterevan."

"God grant it," she replied, in a tone of more cheerful reliance than he had heard in her lips since the evening he left her going in to plead his cause with Cromer at the foot of Murdoch's cross.

And now our wanderers were once more on the road, and a single horse was again their whole equipage; but Gilnaflit was a strong and high mettled steed, and could have run as his double fully as many miles as swiftly than Talbot's care for his wife would permit them to travel. They had not long left the city till they overtook a company of merchants going southward; and as the slow progress of the simpler horses seemed to the pace at which they wished to proceed, they took advantage of their numbers, and thus made their way as far as Kells in safety and with ease; but here their convoy struck off for Dublin, while their road lay through the heart of Meath and Kildare, and accordingly, from Kells they were obliged to journey on alone. The first day or two ordinary traveling passed without interruption or accident; and they fixed upon Raheen as the termination of their next stage. They had now left the borders of Meath, and were journeying through a less cultivated country, and Talbot had prepared Ellen to expect much ruder scenery ere they should gain their resting place; for, to avoid the dangerous vicinity of the rebel garrisons, they had to take the most westerly road, and this led through a succession of woods and bogs, gradually growing wilder, until, about sunset, they found themselves in a narrow bridle-path, threading a wooded valley that stretched away before them in interminable woods and thickets, enlivened by the slightest mark of a human habitation, and Raheen was still some five miles distant. The sun had now set, and the outline of the high grounds on their right showed dark, and clearly defined against the red horizon. Both involuntarily turned their eyes from the shadowy valley through which they rode to gaze on the parting twilight. "It is like our hopes," said Ellen, mournfully, "I would it were not."

"I would it were, dear love, but we should then be bright again to-morrow; but why so mournful, Ellen?"

"My heart," she said, "is weighed down, and why, I cannot tell; it sinks with the sun I think—I never so dreaded the approach of night before."

"It is but fancy, dear Ellen; we have nothing to fear from the darkness, our path, if not broad, is well beaten. I have traveled the road often before."

"These woods look wild and impassable; if wattaryed into them he would be lost."

"But we cannot stray; I could feel my way, if the night were blacker than the dungeons of Stranclyf; and, as for the woods, they were scoured of wolves within a month; word you the death!—Richard Tyrrell, secure the jailer, and bring him to our head, I am sure it is he."

Talbot rendered up his sword, and such papers as he carried, and they all proceeded towards the gap. "If I thought they were Macloghlan's men," he whispered to Ellen, "I would tell them the truth; for they care little for the plunders of the Church when refounded by a baron; but I now doubt them much—they are over eain for mere friars."

"Ah!" she cried, "they know us—I am sure they do—but for the love you bear me, give them fair words."

"The redless is Sassenagh," said one of the galloglasses; "she takes to him in English; I know from the first it was he."

"Who?" cried Talbot, "whom do you take me for? Who are ye yourselves?"

"Silence," cried the captain from the front, "hold no communication with the prisoner, but bring him on."

They rode forward in silence and mutual uncertainty, until a turn of the road among the rocks of the pass brought them on a wide decline, surrounded by a picket of Irish horsemen—the same from whom they had heard the answering shout that stopped their flight on the other side of the defile. By this light the leader of the new comers perused the papers taken from Talbot. He smiled as he read the name inserted in the definitive passport, and cast the document contemptuously into the flames; but the letter from Sarsfield he carefully folded, and deposited in his doublet. His countenance of fierce exultation, as by the light of the flames he read the charge, and the sentence of death, and the signature of Richard Tyrrell, was terrific.

"Talbot, I am sure it is Talbot," he muttered, "the hated pensioner of the English Government, who betrayed the Geraldines, and sold his own blood for gold. Richard Tyrrell, I am sure it is he—and Ellen, Ellen, my own Ellen, beyond that ridge of bare land that rises out of the wood before me; you cannot see the gap from this, but it lies yonder where the hill appears the least—at the bottom ground."

"And is that the only pass?" cried Ellen, in accents of wakeful alarm.

"Nothing, love," she replied; "it was nothing; but we must make haste, or it will be midnight ere we reach Kilkea. Do you think, love, you could ride a little faster?"

"Oh, ride as fast as you will, I can bear whatever must be done, for I am sure there is danger near us." Tell me, I entreat you, what is it that you see upon the hill?"

"I think it was but the three lads over the ridge that I could not make out at first, dear Ellen, standing, you must take the spur; we have no time now to loiter."

"Three lads!" repeated Ellen, bending her eyes on the verge of the horizon; "they are moving and rising! there—under the pale cloud—look, look, they are spears and banners, and they come this way!"

"There is indeed a force of horses there," replied the knight, no longer trying to conceal the cause of his anxiety; "but till they top the hill, I cannot tell whether Irish or English. We, however, are safe here in the hollow; they can never see us while we keep here in the shadow. But there, I have their head-pieces between me and the light; they are Irish; I know them by their high helmets and their spears; we are safe now, we have their whole army on the ridge of the hill; you can see, from their seats, that they ride without the stirrup. Strike out, Gilnaflit! I would not take the best castle in Meath, and fall into their hands!"

"Saints protect us!" exclaimed Ellen, "would you dread violence from them?"

"If I had a battle of my own galloglass at my back, Ellen, I would care no more for their bows than for a rabble of horse-boys; but alone, I would give a month of my life to be though Barnaleg before them."

"Dear John, they soon will be within the shelter of the wood, and let them pass the first!"

"No; for the plundering dogs—and I am sure they are MacCoghlan's men preying on the pale—will see the gap guarded; it is their practice; they always do so. We must either go before them, or go back by Kilmacmahon."

"Ah! that were a long delay; but surely we are so much nearer, that they cannot fail to gain it first."

"I would not have for the world, Ellen; but you see that bare ridge before us; we must, as I said, before, cross it to come at the pass; and there, love, you know, I have gained the ridge of the hill, these knaves will be in the hollow, where they cannot miss seeing us against the sky. Just as we now see them, We should then have to ride hard to escape pursuit, and I fear, love, you could ill bear the violence of such a flight."

"Oh! do not fear for me; I can bear to ride as you will. But, sweet Mother, propose and they are coming down the hill. My bitter curse upon them!" cried Talbot, as he gave the reins to Gluudhu, and sprung out from the low gorge of the valley upon the side of the exposed eminence, holding round the hill as low as the broken ground permitted, and stooping level with his horse's neck as they passed each clump of furze or brushwood that concealed their ascent. At last the bare top of the ridge lay before them.

"Now, love," said Talbot, "there we run the gauntlet; but I'd rather than the best prey MacCoghlan ever drove, that this sunset had been an hour later, or darker with clouds. If we be seen, hold fast, for we must put Gluudhu to his speed. Once through the gap, and we are safe, for the country is open on both sides—we will have whatever must be done, for I am sure there is danger near us. Tell me, I entreat you, what is it that you see upon the hill?"

"I think it was but the three lads over the ridge that I could not make out at first, dear Talbot, standing, you must take the spur; we have no time now to loiter."

His Highness the Maharajah of Puttiala visited St. Thomas' Church on the 17th February. The chief object that attracted his attention was the large quantity over the high altar, the meaning of which he wished to have explained to him. The Maharajah then begged leave to see the convent adjoining, which was kindly granted. He was somewhat puzzled to reconcile the story of celibacy taken by the clergy and religious orders with the idea of a priestly caste such as he had imagined them to be. He was informed that the clergy and religious of either sex were recruited from outside, and that the Catholic clergy were of all others the most incompatible with the idea of a Levitical tribe.

THE MODOC WAR.

The news from the front in our last issue gave a full and detailed account of matters at the Lava Bed up to Wednesday, the 16th. On the morning of the 16th a hotly contested fight took place on Colonel Green's left. The Indians endeavored to get to the lake for water, but our troops succeeded in keeping them away. A dispatch was received from Mason's camp at 7 A. M., saying that some of the Modocs had passed out on his left, and were on his flank and rear. During the night the mustars under command of Major Thomas kept up a fire on the Modoc camp, which kept them very much annoyed. The Indians could be heard yelling and shouting at an awful rate. Attwood'clock this morning the troops under Colonel Green started with a cheer, and before 10 A. M. had reached reached the top of the ridge next to Jack's camp, which was entirely contested yesterday and which has been nearly deserted to-day. Orders were then given to sweep the lava bed and all Indians were ordered out to Captain Barnard, ordering him, in case the Modocs had got out on Colonel Mason's left, to pursue them immediately with the cavalry and give them no rest. Orders have been given for Colonel Mason to move to the right forward as rapidly as possible and join Colonel Green's left. The will push on the fight, which is now in progress, to preserve their own top-knots.

A captured squaw stated to the soldiers that Schonchin was wounded by Meacham, and that he died of his wounds.

A dispatch dated Yreka, April 17th, says: "From a strictly reliable gentleman, who has been through the lava country, we learn that there is a large cave six miles from the late Modoc stronghold, in a southerly course, the very direction taken by the Indians. This cave will be harder to approach and will prove a better fortress than shells, and is amply supplied with wood, and food for animals, but is, according to the reconnoitering, scarce of water. Between the two places there are a great many lesser caverns and crevices, but no water."

On the evening of the 18th, Hon. J. K. Luttrell arrived here from Hot Springs. He says the Indians of Klamath and Salmon seem fully posted in the Modoc war—even better than the whites. One Indian who him he had seen a Modoc who told him all about the fight. It is said that Modoc runners have visited all the tribes of Northern California and Southern Oregon. The people of Klamath and Del Norte counties, however, apprehend no outbreak at present.

The Indians were seen in close proximity to camp on the 21st. They came to the lake for water. They were in equal distance south of their former position. They are said to hold a strong position there, also, that they will make a stand at that point. It is said that their women and children were removed there before the massacre, and also a quantity of ammunition and water, though the latter is doubtful.

Fortification will doubtless be thrown up at points commanding the lake shore to guard the water line. Eleven bodies and one live Modoc were found in the cave of the Lava Bed to-day. This makes sixteen warriors slain that we know of, with the wounded unknown. Some of the bodies were horribly mangled by shells. In all six soldiers and one civilian have been slain on our side, with eleven wounded two seriously, and four disabled by agrained snakes. It is reported to-night that two more are wounded in the Lava Bed.

If the Modocs remain in their present position they be attacked as soon as the cavalry return. Hovey, of Yreka, was buried this evening (April 21st.) He was horribly mangled, scalped, disemboweled, and his head mashed. Harmon, who fell within the Indian line, was scalped.

The Warm Spring Indians are scouring the country east of the battle-ground, working toward the craters which end the high lodge of the Modoc stronghold to the south.

The lava bed presented a horrible spectacle. Bodies were discovered in crevices, and from under heaps of rock a sickening stench exhales, filling the air with sickening colors. There must have been many killed and wounded that we know nothing of.

An old squaw captured by the soldiers confirms the death of Schonchin, who was shot by Meacham at the massacre. If the Indians do make a stand this country will be in a horrid state this summer. Ranchers will lose all their cattle and be compelled to abandon their ranches. Fifty desperate savages roaming through those rocky fastnesses can and will work incalculable destruction to property and cause a fearful loss of life.

Schonchin's body was found, 'and his head taken to camp. He was not killed by Meacham, but was killed by a shell, his whole body below the waist being torn out. Winema, the squaw of young Modoc, was also recognized among the dead. The shell that killed Schonchin also killed Jack's brother, who was slightly wounded yesterday and which has been nearly deserted to-day. Orders were then given to sweep the lava bed and all Indians were ordered out to Captain Barnard, ordering him, in case the Modocs had got out on Colonel Mason's left, to pursue them immediately with the cavalry and give them no rest. Orders have been given for Colonel Mason to move to the right forward as rapidly as possible and join Colonel Green's left. ### BRIGHT K. TRIPP'S LECTURE.

To the Editor of The Monitor: My attention has been called to a lecture given by Bright K. Tripp at Platt's Hall, on the 3d ult., at the request of James Adams (the present Sheriff), Nathaniel Curry, Hiram Reynolds, J. B. Felton and others, I am at a loss to know what there is to be gained by the delivery of such lectures at this age and in this enlightened age, unless it be to engender discord among our people in order to carry out the designs of the English Government, whose paid agent I believe the promoters of that lecture wishing to be. I am willing to acquit Bright K. Tripp of all malicious intent, as he has been rather soft on anything pertaining to literary subjects, and may have been duped by Adams and others into giving his name to the call. The lecturer's picture of the rise and decay of monkish churches and convents is simply ridiculous. To begin that time levels every thing on his peculiar sphere of ours. What is left of Solomon's Temple? What remains of the temples of Tyre, Sidon, Greece and Rome? Nothing—except, perhaps, an occasional broken column or capital. Such are the effects of the ever changing mortal hand of the hand of Time. According to the law of progress, what would suit centuries ago in affairs religious or secular would not suit now. Progress is the order of the day. Why did not Tripp & Co. were vomiting their virus against the Jesuits, the Regents of the University were using a spectre-ridden cowed from the Jesuits on Market street—an instrument, by the by, for their purpose? Simply because they knew any thing about, except by name, until Professor Neri commenced his course of lectures. Whilst I am speaking on this subject I would advise J. B. Felton, next time he invites Tripp to lecture, to get Father Accolti or Neri to bring his instrument, so that the whole crew may get a glimpse at the light of heaven, as, from present appearances, that might be their last chance. ORION.

France and Ireland.

On the 25th of March, in the versailles Assembly, a debate took place on the recently introduced French charities bill. This measure places charities of all kinds in each "commune" or district under the supervision of a Board of Administrators, or, as we say, a Board of Governors. M. de Girard proposed that on the board the parish priest of the commune, or, if there were more than one parish in the commune, the senior parish priest should be a member of the said. On this proposition a lively debate took place, in which the proposal was supported by Monsignor Dupanloup, the Catholic Bishop of Orleans and member of the Assembly for one of the districts of his diocese. He, as a man also in the habit of speech ever exceeded former efforts. In tones at once dignified but impressive he spoke of the history of the connection between Catholicism and charity. Before Christianity, he said, the world was full of the cry of the starving, single hospital, a single asylum for suffering. The names of the first founders of charity were unknown. "When," he exclaimed, "I asked the Bishop, who you owns the Royal Hospital, the Hospital of the Incurables, the general hospital, and the foundling hospital? To a priest, to Vincent de Paul. Say, citizens, all this monstrous charity which is the glory of France, by means of the little Sisters of the Poor, the hospitals, the foundling hospitals, which will give shelter to 20,000 children! Then the Bishop argued that the proposed measure, possibly not quite perfect in that, among other advantages, it would mingle the lay and clerical elements in the work of charity. He continued: "Where lay men and clergymen are thus associated, they learn to esteem each other; they explain and hear each other's views; they learn to love, to esteem, to help each other for the common good. We should unite together. Ah, that was what we did during the war. Then we all united, and we were successful. It was necessary to form a committee for the relief of so many needs, for so many sufferings for the general welfare, for the cause of the war, for the desolated villages, for the poor, the widows, shoeless, ragged, starving, than all the world joined in the movement. They asked me to become president of the committee. I declined. They said to me, 'Then you will try and get us some help?' I replied, 'Yes, I will try.' And I did try. I began by writing to my wife, and asking her to render homage to those who heard their generosity; their charity was admirable. But add also came from abroad. It was from Ireland, especially, that help came especially from that incomparable nation called Ireland—incomparable for her faith, incomparable for her generosity. For my diocese alone I received 200,000 francs from Ireland. Why did we receive this immense sum? Gentlemen, because they love France; because ten years ago when famine was desolating Ireland, I went to Paris to St. Roch, and obtained 20,000 francs. You see that they have paid me with usury. It has touched me to the heart. I cannot without profound emotions, recall the remembrance I received from Dublin, from Cork; from Limerick, from Kerry, with the simple words, 'A souvenir from Ireland.'" The Bishop's speech was full of such touching incidents, the loud applause which burst from every part of the Assembly, and the proclaim, trumpet-tongued the gratitude with which France has treasured up the memory of the hand which her sister Ireland stretched forth to her in the hour of her bitterest woe.—Dublin Freeman.

LETTER FROM STOCKTON.

STOCKTON, April 29, 1873.

To the Editor of The Monitor: Believing that your readers are interested to some extent in the crop prospects of the San Joaquin Valley, as well as other matters affecting the general welfare of society, permit me to "presume" a section of Tax Monitor in which to disseminate such items of news as may happen to fall under by pen in the course of this rambling letter. And first in order and importance are

THE CROPS.

An immense extent of this valley is under cultivation, which being almost the only thing that the farmers have paid any attention to; and until some two weeks ago the hope of a bountiful harvest were founded upon an apparently substantial basis. But the lack of the usual spring rains has upset even the most reasonable calculations. And whilst the aggregate crop will be quite large, yet many individuals, I fear, will be utterly ruined. Favored localities will produce generously, but it is now an established fact that a large section of this valley, particularly the west side of the San Joaquin river, will not produce enough to pay for harvesting. Farmers in that part of the county are despondent, and their lack of success is having a most depressing effect on the business of Stockton, which mainly depends upon farming industry.

POLITICS.

The political lion has taken the tender lamb to his generous bosom, and both are taking a comfortable nap together in the Democratic den. Nominations have been made for all the municipal offices. Straight Republicans, Liberal ditto, Democrats, Hard-shells, Hunkers, Silver Grays and Popular Sovereignty men taking part in the harmonious elements. One ticket, only is in the field. Election comes off on June 2d. Then Christian meekness and forbearance is having its reward, even in this life. We would have thought that the long-promised millennium would first be proclaimed in sweet angelic tones from the steps of the Stockton Court-house? To the credit of your humble city be it known down with political cars, and responsibilities and who long for rest and refreshment, I say, let them come here to Stockton and partake of the delicious shade which our big liberty-pole, and recline their aching head upon the soft grass of our County House Square—listen to the melody of mocking birds that abound in the ample foliage of the spreading trees, and enjoy the sweet converse of a community that has buried the political hatchet, and are smoking the "pipe of peace" with a genius that is "Captain Jack" in his palmiest days never approached.

EDUCATION.

The youth of Stockton will never have cause to complain in regard to educational facilities. The public schools are conducted favorably with any in the State. And as for the Catholic schools, under the immediate management of Father O'Connor's assistants, they are in a most flourishing condition. Father Spelman, the only thing wanting is sufficiency of room. The school is crowded; in fact, it would require a house as large as our church to accomodate all the Catholic children in this community. I verily believe that as much attention will be paid to school buildings under Father O'Connor's administration as to church edifices; and, I may add, he will be successful in these measures. Ignorance must take a back seat.

WHISKY.

We have a city remarkable for its usual sobriety, yet there are eight-three places where "red rain" is disposed of at twenty cents and a half cents per glass. The Champions of the Red Cross are about to make a raid on whisky. This organization is gaining strength daily—receiving members who are exercising immense weight, as prominent business and professional men. They propose to have a temperance journal, to be published in this city, and a popular lecturer of the Methodist Church, and a minister of the Methodist Church, and a minister of the Methodist Church, and a minister

Speaking of the recent unsuccessful attempt to raise $500,000 for the purpose of publishing a daily Catholic newspaper in New York, the Catholic Telegraph (Cincinnati) says that the German Catholics of that city have long since established and have succeeded in raising the sum of $500,000 for the purpose of publishing a daily Catholic newspaper in the German language. The money is paid in and the paper will soon be started.

On Saturday, March 22d, the ceremony of profession took place at the Holy Cross Convent, Killarney, when the Right Rev. Bishop of Kerry officiating. Second—To provide a home for young women who are employed during the day. The home will be under the care and direction of a Miss Nardin, and will be situated in the building next the Cathedral in Buffalo, N. Y.

His Highness the Maharajah of Patiala visited St. Thomas' Church, Calcutta, on the 11th February. The chief object that attracted his attention was the large ornament over the high altar, the meaning of which he wished to have explained to him. The Maharajah then begged leave to see the convent sitting, which was readily granted. He was somewhat puzzled to reconcile the vows of selfdenial taken by the clergy and religious orders with the idea of a princely palace such as he had imagined them to be. He was informed that the clergy and religious of either sex were recruited from outside, and that the Catholic clergy was of all others the most incompatible with the idea of a Levitical tribe.

A recent issue of the Dublin Gazette contains a list of the bequests left by the late Very Rev. Dr. Cleary, V. G., parish priest of Charleville, county Cork. He devises some property he held in the town of Charleville to the Convent of Mercy there, and various sums, amounting in all to £1,000, to various charitable institutions in the town and diocese, and to be distributed among the poor of the parish. His library he left to St. Coleman's College, Fermoy. The residue of his property is bequeathed to the Mother Superior of the Charleville Convent and her successors for the use of the institution and the relief of the poor. The Bishop of the diocese, Very Rev. Dr. Keane, and the parish priest of Mallow, Very Rev. J. Meagher, are appointed executors of his will.

THE MODOC WAR.

The news from the front in our last issue gave a full and detailed account of matters at the Lava Bed up to Wednesday, the 16th, on the morning of the 18th a body of cavalry fight took place on Colonel Green's left. The Indians endeavored to get to the lake for water, but our troops succeeded in keeping them away. A dispatch was received from Mason's camp at 7 A. M., saying that some of the Modocs had passed out on his left, and were on his flank and rear. During the night the mortars under command of Major Thomas kept up a fire on the Modoc camp, which kept them very much annoyed. The Indians could be heard yelling and shouting in an excited manner. Wednesday morning the troops under Colonel Green started with a view to attack the Modocs, and reached nearly the top of the ridge next to Jack's camp, which was so hotly contested yesterday and which has been nearly deserted to-day. Orders were then given to sweep the lava bed and a dispatch was sent to Gillem to capture, if possible, the very direction taken by the Indians. This cave will be harder to approach and will protect them much better from shells, and is amply supplied with wood, and food for animals, but is, according to late revisbetween, nearly half a mile from water. Between the two fires there is a great many lesser caverns and crevices, but no water.

On the evening of the 18th, Hon. J. K. Luttrell arrived from Orleans Bar. He says the Indians of Jack's camp and Schonchin seem fully posted in the Modoc war—even better than the whites. They know all the movements of the whites who told him all about the fight. It is evident that Modoc runners have been sent to the Indians on the Klamath and Southern Oregon. The people of Klamath and Del Norte counties, however, apprehend no serious attack at present.

The Indians were seen in close proximity to camp on the 21st. They came to the lake for water. Three shots were heard to the southwest, evidently Indians killing cattle, as hundreds are feeding in that neighborhood. The afternoon the Indians were seen to come off and haul their horses at the foot of the sand butte, about four miles south from here, quite a signal designating their former position. They are said to hold a strong position there, and that they will make a stand at that point. It is said that their women and children were removed there before the massacre, and also a quantity of ammunition and water, through the last is doubtful.

Reinforcements will doubtless be thrown up to points commanding the lake shore to guard the water line. Eleven bodies and one live Modoc were found in the cave of the Lava Bed to-day. The Snakes stated warriors slain that we know of, with the wounded unknown. Some of the bodies were horribly mangled by shells. Small are soldiers and one civilian have been slain on our sides, with eleven wounded (two seriously) and four disabled by sprained ankles. It is reported tonight that two more are wounded in the Lava Bed.

If the Modocs remain in their present position they in attacked as soon as the cavalry arrives. Captain Jack's camp was burned this evening (April 23d). He was horribly mangled, scalped, disemboweled, and his head mashed. Hasbrook, who fell within the Indian line, was scalped.

The Warm Spring Indians are scouring the country east of the battle ground, working toward the craters which end the high ledge of the Modoc stronghold to the south.

The lava bed presented a horrible spectacle. Bodies were discovered in crevices, and from under heaps of rock a sickening stench exhales, filling the air with sickening odors. Those must have been many killed and wounded that we know nothing of.

An old squaw captured by the soldiers confirms the death of Schonchin, who was shot by Meacham at the massacre. The Indians do make a stand this country will be in a horrid state this summer. Ranchers will lose all their cattle and be compelled to abandon their ranches. Fifty desperate savages roaming through those rocky fastnesses can and will work incalculable destruction to property and cause a fearful loss of life.

Schonchin's body was found, and his head taken to camp. He was not killed by Meacham's shot, as at first said. He was killed by a shell, his whole body below the breast being torn out. Wachenaie, another young Modoc, was found dead near among the dead. The shell that killed Schonchin and others was picked up by Wachenaie, who was about to see what it was made of, when it burst in his hand.

April 27th.—The cavalry have returned without seeing any Indians on the plain trail. Dr. Cabaniss has returned from the front, and reports two squaws captured. An old squaw brought in yesterday from Jack's camp says that Schonchin told her that it was his. His head was cut off for medical use, and when it was shown to the squaw she recognized it. That Schonchin he was killed by Meacham at the massacre of the Peace Commission, though he did not die for a day or two."

ATTESTATION OF MIRACLES.

BY RIGHT REV. DR. RAY.

When any Holy servant of God dies in the odor of sanctity, whose virtuous and holy life gives a well-grounded hope to those who know it, that his soul is received into eternal glory, the faithful are not limited from having recourse to God, under his intercession, and of asking benefits from Almighty God through the help of his prayers. If these favors be not granted, and no further signs of its being with God be manifested, this private devotion naturally decays, and after a time ceases entirely.

But if Almighty God should be pleased to grant the favors demanded, and even to work miracles at the invocation of his holy servant, these being published among the faithful, increase the reputation of his sanctity, and give encouragement to others to have recourse to his intercession, in hopes of receiving the like blessings from God through his means. When this happens to be the case, things are allowed to go on without any judicial cognizance being taken of them for some time. Experience shows how easily the bulk of mankind, especially the unlearned, allow themselves to be surprised by any thing that strongly affects them. The common opinion of the sanctity of the person deceased, if followed by a report, whether true or false, of any miracle wrought by his means, cannot fail at first to make a deep impression on the minds of the vulgar; but if the foundation be false, the superstructure will soon fall to the ground. A little time must be given, and some allowance must be made to those first transports of devotion. Error cannot always continue to impose; and imposture sooner or later must be discovered. But if the reputation of the person's sanctity and of the miracles, if the fame of supernatural events wrought by his intercession continues; if, instead of diminishing, these things make greater and greater progress, and gain daily credit in the minds of men; then, from this constant increasing public voice in his favor, there arises a well-grounded motive for making a more particular inquiry into the nature and truth of those things which are alleged. If, therefore, the state, or any religious order, or any particular person or persons, who may have been connected with the deceased, should think proper, upon this public reason, to interest themselves in having his cause tried at the supreme tribunal, in order to his canonization, their first application must be made to the diocesan bishop, to whom it belongs, in full right, to take a judicial cognizance in the first instance, of the public fame in the saint's favor, both as to his holy life and miracles. This first judgment is so much personally required, that the court of Rome will not allow any cause of this kind to a hearing till this step be taken, and the acts of the judicial inquiry of the bishop be fully proved before them, with all the formalities prescribed to be observed by him in making it. Now these formalities are ten in number, and are as follows:

First—To avoid all precipitation as I observed above, the public fame of the saint's sanctity and miracles of the deceased must have existed for a considerable time, before the bishop is allowed to begin his proceedings of inquiring about them.

Second—The bishop himself must personally take cognizance of them, and cannot be obliged to subdelegate any of his inferior clergy in his place, this judge must have a doctor in divinity, and a licentiate in canon law for his assistants.

Third—He who takes the depositions of the witnesses must countersign every article with the witnesses themselves, who must subscribe them.

Fourth—Each deponent must be asked a circumstantial relation of the facts he attests. It is not allowed to read over to the other witnesses what was deposed by the first, and cause it to be confirmed by their consent; but each one must be examined apart by himself, and their answers extended at full length to each interrogatory. Nay,

Fifth—The notary, and the promoter of the cause, as well as the witnesses themselves, must all be put under oath to observe the most profound silence with regard to the questions put or the answers given.

Sixth—Information must be sent to the Pope of the whole proceeding, and of the judgment of the bishop passed thereupon.

Seventh—A clean copy of all the papers must be made out in proper form, and these authenticated and well sealed, must be sent to the Congregation of Rites at Rome.

Eighth—All the originals are preserved in the archives of the cathedral church of the diocese, in a proper case, well sealed, and under different keys, which are deposited with different persons of rank and character.

Ninth—Besides the witnesses presented to the bishop by those who solicit the cause, he must also examine as many others as he can get scrupulous of, who are capable of giving any proper information.

Tenth—The extra judicial acts or attestations are allowed to be inserted among the authentic writings of the process.

Now, when one has not seen in all this procedure the utmost care and diligence used to prevent all imposition, and cause to be drawn out certain knowledge of the truth? The particular and searching examination of each article separately—the ignorance of each one in all of the questions put to the others—the solemn oath all are obliged to take never to discuss the subject of the questions put, or the answers given—the not being content with the witnesses presented by the solicitors of the cause, but the procuring as many others as can be got—the care to preserve the papers from all improper inspection;—what are all these but the most efficacious steps to prevent collusion, either among the present witnesses, or in those who may be afterwards examined, and to procure from each the most exact information of what he knows according as it really exists in his mind? who would suppose that a miracle proved by this judgment alone might justly be deemed sufficient to gain all belief and credit from any reasonable unprejudiced person; and yet all this is but as it were the prelude to what follows after.

When the diocesan bishop has done his part, and from the evidence he has got in the above trial has passed his sentence as to the miracles examined by him, an authentic copy of the whole process, well sealed, is sent to the Congregation of Rites at Rome, and there it must be deposited with the notary of that congregation for ten years, before the seals can be opened, or any further step be taken in the cause. During this period, however, particular attention is directed to the following circumstances:

First—Whether the public remain concurring the virtues and miracles of the saint continues in vigor and increases, or decays and fails.

Second—Whether any set use accusations appear against him, or any strong suspicions, any weighty doubts are entertained concerning the propriety of his conduct.

Third—If he had composed any writings during his lifetime, they are next minutely examined, to see if in them any error, either with regard to faith or morals, can be manifested, this private devotion naturally decays, and after a time ceases entirely.

But if all these particulars are favorable, at the expiration of the ten years the cause is taken up again to be fully canvassed by the Rites in this form: The solicitors for the cause demand of the court that the process, ending as on the diocesan head, may be opened and examined. This is done with all formality; and if, upon examining these processes, it be found, that everything was performed according to rule, then the Pope is applied to for a commission to authorize the congregation to proceed in the cause, which is granted accordingly. Then the cause is taken entirely out of the diocesan, and every step that follows is taken by authority of the sovereign pontiff.

The Congregation of Rites is a tribunal at Rome, composed of a number of cardinals, who are the chief judges, and of judges of the second order, who are called Consultors. The officers of this court are: The postulator of the faith, or solicitor general, who represents the public, and proposes every difficulty he can invent against the person whose causes are tried in this court. 2. The secretary of the congregation. 3. The promoter of the faith, who is also called the neighboring bishop, one whom is generally the ordinary of the diocese where the saint's body is, and who gives a solemn oath of assistance. Then the solicitors for the cause draw up in writing the articles to be examined upon, and the commissioner, with the different titles the several facts and miracles are to be proved, which they lodge the best founded, and the most proper for evidencing the sanctity of the deceased and his glory in heaven.

All these preparatory writings are given in to be resolved by the promoter of the faith, who from them draws up instructions for his substitute with the commissioners, who is to attend to the vice-gerent, and those consult all the objections and difficulties he can invent against the facts and miracles proposed by the other party to be examined by the judges. All these papers, together with the commission to the judges, and the form of the oath to be taken by the witnesses, are carefully sealed up in one packet, and sent in the utmost secrecy to the place, who having canvassed all the others concerned, the commission is opened and read, the oath is taken, and the vice-gerent and officers of the court appointed and sworn. A day is then fixed upon and the witnesses, and their depositions taken in the church, or some chapel or holy place, in order to inspire them with that awe and greater horror of perjury. The oath they take upon the holy gospels excludes parties. 1. Such as have not seen the whole truth they know, without concealing or disguising any part of it. 2. Such as are not competent witnesses to any one either the questions put to them, or the answers they give. After taking the oath, they are examined upon the articles of the cause, and on any other subject which the judges think proper. At the end of every session the papers are all sealed and locked up till the next meeting; and when the whole information is taken, all the papers are authenticated by the names and seals of the judges and principal officers of the court; and the original, deposited in three of the dioceses; and clean copies of the whole, collated in presence of the judges themselves and authenticated by their seals and subscriptions, are sent to Rome by a courier express, who is also sworn to execute his commission with all fidelity.

Such is the procedure of this court in general; we shall now see to what end the failure of the proof required by it in order to ascertain the facts examined. The general principle of the Church in all these cases is, to treat these causes with the very same rigor with which criminal causes are tried in civil courts, and require that the facts be proved with the same exactness, and all proceedings have with the same solemnity, as if done for the punishment of crimes. Suppose one insane naive practitioner, such as I myself was when a student of physic, should rashly undertake to cure a criminal, he rejected in this court as incapable of the least hope of receiving the like blessings from God through his means. When this happens to be the case, things are allowed to go on without any judicial cognizance being taken of them for some time. Experience shows how easily the bulk of mankind, especially the unlearned, allow themselves to be surprised by any thing that strongly affects them. The common opinion of the sanctity of the person deceased, if followed by a report, whether true or false, of any miracle wrought by his means, cannot fail at first to make a deep impression on the minds of the vulgar; but if the foundation be false, the superstructure will soon fall to the ground. ## WHAT IS TO COME OF IT?

What has become of the national reputation of the United States? It has been deliberately murdered by dishonest politicians. Although murdered, however, it can be called back to life again by the voice of the honorable party speaking with proper authority. Will they speak? That is the question. To do so they will have to ignore, at least for a while, their petty divisions, forget their local shibboleths, and think and act as a united and harmonious body. It is not by any means necessary that they should abandon the great principles for which they have so often battled against reactionism; but they must recognize the important fact that an issue immeasurably greater than any existing between them and their mere political adversaries, lies between the country and the men who have plundered and dishonored it.

It has now come to pass that the United States, which once enjoyed the proudest position among the nations of the earth, which was feared, respected and admired abroad, is looked upon with contempt and spoken of as though it demonstrated the failure of republican institutions. We can hardly take up any one of the leading European journals without finding therein an article treating this Government as if it were nothing better than organized robbery. And the reason for this harsh criticism is self-evident. It is the dishonesty which has been revealed in all branches of the public service, legislative and executive. The Tammany frauds, the Credit Mobilier scandals, the daily defalcations in every State, the Texas Railroad affair, and last, but not least, the Vienna Commission revelations, have almost annihilated our credit. No wonder, then, if foreigners should ask are there any honest officials in America—any men who can keep their hands out of the people's pocket?

It is the inevitable loss of confidence in one consequent upon these matters that is causing the depression in the money market, the general stagnation in business and the universal doubt as to the ability of the nation to discharge its liabilities. The crime committed by most in high positions are many and grave—the amount of money stolen from the people is actually enormous; but, after all, these things ought not cause us to despair, and they can be remedied in the course of time. In our opinion, the greatest evil of all is the patience with which these delinquencies are suffered, and the readiness with which they are condoned by the masses of the people themselves. If a man placed in an office of trust steals a hundred thousand dollars, or anything between that and a million, his prosecution—supposing that he be troubled at all that way, which does not happen in nine cases out of ten—is not half as serious an affair as the hunting down of a Barbary-coaster who takes half a dozen dollars from the pockets of a drunken comrade. This, of course, indicates that the administration of justice is neither as pure nor as energetic as it should be. Then, again, and worse, the committal of the robbery carries with it scarcely any public odium. The thief, or the "defalcator," to use the genteelest phrase, does not find the doors of his acquaintances shut against him on account of his misdoings. He walks on his head as high as ever, and "respectable" society revolves him just as graciously as ever.

For example of this we may observe it has never come under our notice that any one of the law-makers implicated in the Credit Mobilier scandals had to endure the least ostracism from fashionable circles. General FREMONT, whom a French court has sentenced to a term of imprisonment as a rogue and as swindler, very probably thinks that affair a capital joke, and laughs heartily over it at the dining-table with his friends. There was plenty of strong evidence to prove that Mr. SHERIDAN COLLES was a perjurer and a receiver of bribes; yet the President did not hesitate to avow sympathy with him and give him a certificate of good character. In the case of PEIXOTO, DUDGEON & Co., we have the Government offering to compound a felony. All of these matters are perfectly disgraceful and are a reproach to the entire community. They seem to lead irresistibly to the conclusion that the public sentiment has been debauched, and that the distinction between right and wrong is being effaced from the minds of the people. There is no use in expecting any reform or improvement to come from the radical ranks. That party has thoroughly identified itself with dishonesty and peculation. It refuses to recognize the commission of such offenses by its leaders as a crime, even as cause for exclusion from their body. They will never redeem our national character.

TYLER CURTIS.—This gentleman left for the East last Saturday on the steamer Great Republic. It has been widely rumored that, after all, Curtis left his financial affairs in a very unsatisfactory state for his creditors, and that he is a defaulter to a large amount. A few days previous to the departure he married Miss Annie McKenzie, daughter of Colonel J. W. McKenzie, a lady who has achieved quite a reputation in this city as an opera singer. Miss McKenzie had recently been divorced from her husband.

THE CARLISTS.

Going to some nature or another, rather difficult to make out at this distance, the Carlists are not gaining their ground in Spain as rapidly as they seemed likely to do. In fact, their operations have almost come to a standstill. We read of no more towns captured by them, very few collisions with the Government forces are reported; and, altogether, there appears to be an astonishing lull in the conflict. Meanwhile, as if to show what Spanish "republicanism" is worth, we are told that the Reds are dominant in Madrid, that a Commune has been proclaimed, and that members of the late Ministry are hiding from popular fury. Hundreds of respectable families are quitting the Capital, alarmed at the prospect of civil war, and taking all their property with them. Business is paralyzed in every department, and confidence in the established order of affairs has completely vanished. This is simply the natural consequence of people playing at republicanism who know nothing whatever about it. It would be ridiculous to say that the Government which the party now supreme in Madrid would set up, if their power extended throughout the country, could bear the slightest resemblance to that under which we have the happiness to live. Rather would it be similar to the pandemonium carried on by the Paris assassins and incendiaries little more than two years ago. Yet there are people in America thoughtless enough to sympathize with the Spanish Communists, to think they are battling for liberty, and to condemn the adherents of DON CARLOS as monarchists who being so were a crime. It by no means follows that what the European haters of God's Church and asenties of the rights of property choose to call "republican" is what we in this country would characterize by the same name. On the contrary, the difference between the two is so great that if the doctrines held by the French, Spanish, Italian, German and Swiss Red republicans were preached in the United States, not to speak of any attempt to carry them out, the preachers would stand an excellent chance of being lynched by the indignant populace. Whatever may be the faults of royalty in Europe, it is not in this country would characterize by the same name. On the contrary, the difference between the two is so great that if the doctrines held by the French, Spanish, Italian, German and Swiss Red republicans were preached in the United States, not to speak of any attempt to carry them out, the preachers would stand an excellent chance of being lynched by the indignant populace. Whatever may be the faults of royalty of the country is not favorable to his policy.

The President's conduct has of late been of such a nature as to arouse serious apprehensions in the minds of all who have no desire to see a resuscitation of the Commune. The compact of Bordeaux, so often appealed to, binds him to treat the present Government of France as merely provisional, designed to last only until the evacuation of the territory by the Germans; to take no measures calculated to impose it on the nation or make it permanent, and to leave the ultimate decision as to the kind of Government to be established and maintained to the vote of the people. THIERS is suspected and has frequently been accused of violating this agreement, of throwing himself into the arms of the Republican party, and of endeavoring to secure the recognition of the now-existing state of affairs as irrelievable.

The monarchists maintain, and, it must be admitted, with perfect truth, that the great majority of the people are not by any means republicans, and that, consequently, any movement created by them would represent only the wishes of a minority. Again they say, and with equal truth, that of those Republicans by far the larger portion are Socialists of most extreme views, so the so-called moderates, or those who regard the Government of the United States as a model to be copied, being a mere fraction. From these facts it is argued that a republic could not guarantee to France the tranquillity and order so essential to its future prosperity, but would and at no distant date in the revival of the Commune, with all its mob despotism and violence, and disturbance of society. The revival of the Commune, of course, means another outbreak of civil war, because sensible people are not very likely to suffer the insane monstrosities, the wild laws spewn the forum of men," as they have been not unjustly called, play their pranks unchecked.

There are millions of men in France who will not allow religion to be destroyed, the rights of property to be invaded, and the security of the family tie to be abolished, for the honor and glory of being ruled by men who style themselves Republicans, and who talk loudly about liberty, equality and fraternity. They will not, if they can help it, renew the terrible scenes of 1793, by putting persons in power who stow disbelief in the existence of God, speak of divine faith as superstition, and maintain that all property belongs to the State, individuals having no rights in it. That blasphemous madness has gone by and can never again take possession of the nation. What the respectable, intelligent, educated and orderly classes of France want, and will have, even at the expense of a civil war more fearful than any which has ever desolated the land, is, some Government that will guarantee the maintenance of tranquillity, promote general prosperity and be conducted upon honest common-sense principles. If they cannot see any but a monarchical one, much out of republicanism, the fault lies solely with the individuals who in France are identified with that kind of Government. These are matters that Americans ought to weigh very carefully. They cannot study the realities of things, and not merely the names which men give them. If they did so, they would not commit the monstrous absurdity of confounding such a party, much less their aid, to the diabolical extravagancies which European Communists confound with democratic institutions. They would take the practical stand-point of desiring the same measure taken up by the circumstance whether it was known as republican or monarchical, but whether it allowed people all legitimate liberty, respected their rights and advanced their prosperity.

AN APPEAL TO JUSTICE.

We publish to-day, in another column, an open letter addressed to Governor Booth by a large number of the most respectable citizens of Yolo County, in behalf of one HENRY, as well as a number of the most influential citizens of San Francisco. It has reference to the sad tragedy which was enacted on the 17th of March last, by a few miles from the town of Monterey. Our readers, of course, will understand that we are alluding to the hanging of Mr. MATTHEW TARPEY, by a mob gathered by certified warrant of the Governor, on the evening of the 17th. The alleged "bomb" was nothing more formidable than a small earthen jar, and its contents were nothing more explosive than a couple of revolutionary newspapers! So the "loud detonation" spoken of by the anti-Catholic press, and the "narrow escape from destruction" existed merely in the imagination of some sensational reporter. The lovely fellows who had this terrible "bomb" coolly walked into the middle of the church, and, after getting the priest who should preside over the preparation for exploding it, hurried out of the building as fast as they could. As might naturally be supposed, a great deal of alarm prevailed among the congregation for a few seconds; but as the missile did not show signs of explosion, somebody mustered courage enough to pick it up, and found out what it was. These "bombs" and "infernal machines" are specially arrested, tried—not for attempting to murder or anything of that kind, but merely for disturbing a congregation licensed by law—and sentenced, the leader to three months's imprisonment, and the other two to one months imprisonment each. We did no fault whatever with this sentence, which, most assuredly, did not err on the side of severity; for the "bomb" was found to have been fabricated by the magnates of the English church not long ago. There may, perhaps, be a third, to the effect that the authorities consider the fun to be good enough for California. Which of these is the reason why the murderers of MATTHEW TARPEY are yet at large we really cannot decide.

But whatever be the effect of this "open letter," whether the alarm created by the cowardly assassins of Salinas, Watsonville, Monterey and their vicinities, are made to feel the might of the laws they have violated in so shameful a manner, or whether they will have to settle to the justice of Almighty God, who never lets the deed of blood go unavenged, all honorable and chivalrous men cannot but admire the determination evinced by the signers of the letter to have their name and fame—to refute the foul calumnies that have been so freely ventilated against him, and to brand the wretches who hurried him on to ignominious death upon his miserable, contemptible and degraded hirelings of private malice and hatred.

THE REAL AND THE IMAGINARY.

A few days ago we noticed in the city papers a short paragraph among the foreign news, stating that white Republican Brand, GAVAZZI, was preaching in a Roman church, a bomb was exploded at the entrance of the building, by some miscreants having a murderous intent. Of course the bomb proved to be drawn from this intelligence could be none other than that certain Catholics were desirous of assassinating the preacher or members of his congregation. The matter was considered a failure of plot by sectarian press as a sort of set-off against the many authenticated instances of Orange bombs and hand-grenades being flung by revolutionists into the midst of men and women assembled to assist at the celebration of the divine mysteries. It struck us at the time that the tale was somewhat doubtful, and we could not bring ourselves to believe that even Padre GAVAZZI could be guilty of such a piece of villainy and treachery as that with which he was charged; but as we were in utter ignorance of the circumstances, and had no rebutting evidence to offer, we resolved to say nothing about the matter. Since then, however, we have seen full accounts of the trial of the offenders, and we hasten to relate the simple truth. The alleged "bomb" was nothing more formidable than a small earthen jar, and its contents were nothing more explosive than a couple of revolutionary newspapers! PETER'S JOURNEY, AND OTHER TALES. By Lady Herbert. New York: The Catholic Publication Society. The charming novelettes of Lady Herbert have attained such a degree of popularity that it appears like a labor of supererogation to recommend them. Still we cannot help saying that the stories in the little volume before us are more than usually attractive, and that Catholic parents putting them into the hands of their children will do much to teach lessons of virtue that in time are certain to have excellent effect. The Catholic Publication Society deserves all praise for their efforts to spread wholesome literature among the people.

THE BEAU MUDE; OR, THE ABBE DE L'EPEE. A Historical Drama in Four Acts. Translated from the German. New York: The Catholic Publication Society, 9 Warren street. This is one of the best parlor dramas we have read for for some time. Its only fault is, perhaps, that it is too long, and would require some pruning before it could be conveniently acted. The story is calculated to excite sympathy and sustain interest throughout.

OUTING IN FRANCE. Report of a Conference on the Present Dangers of the Church. New York: The Catholic Publication Society, 9 Warren street. This is an admirable jeu d'esprit. The "Conference" is composed of Times belonging to Ritualism, Broad Church, High Church, Low Church and No-Church-at-all. Their several speeches are little, if anything, altered from those which have really been delivered by the magnates of the English church not long ago. ## The Execution of John J. Murphy.

To the Editor of The Monitor: On Friday, April 25th, the extreme penalty of the law was carried out in the case of John J. Murphy, convicted of the murder of his brother-in-law, Mr. Murray. For some time previous to the commission of the crime for which he suffered, the unhappy man had serious family trouble existing between his sister and her husband. Unfortunately, Mr. Murphy became involved in these difficulties, and in the month of June last, murdered his brother-in-law. He was convicted in Stockton, and on an appeal being made to the Supreme Court, a new trial was granted, which took place on the 19th of August, 1872, and Murphy was again convicted. He was rendered by the jury. A second appeal was made and the Supreme Court approved the judgment of the District Court.

On the 28th of February, Judge Bradford, of the Nineteenth District Court, fixed the day of execution for Friday, the 25th of April. In the meantime, the friends of the deceased were using every effort, and had placed before him a petition praying that he might be pleased to commute the sentence to penal servitude for life. Owing to the peculiar circumstances of the case, many were entertained that Governor Booth would favorably consider the request. On Monday, 21st of April, the Executive officially notified the prisoner that the decision affirmed by the Supreme Court could not be carried into effect. The doomed man received the announcement with great resignation, and piously devoted the few remaining days of his life to preparing for the awful hour, when he should undergo the punishment due to the crime of which he was convicted. We did no fault whatever with this sentence, which, most assuredly, did not err on the side of severity; for the "bomb" was found to have been fabricated by the magnates of the English church not long ago. ## THE "CHRONICLE" AND MIRACLES.

To the Editor of The Monitor: I see by your pages that a good deal of attention has been directed, of late, to the subject of miracles. Your learned contemporary, the Chronicle, is evidently an unbeliever in their reality. According to him they are only natural phenomena, readily explained by scientific inquiry. The laws of nature are never subjected, he intimates, to suspension by interposition of Divine Providence. What appears to be such is only so in the imagination of the ignorant and superstitious, who confound the preternatural with the natural. As examples he refers to the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, and the manna in the desert, both of which, he assures us, were not miraculous but natural occurrences. The clue to the difficulty standing the former, he tells us, is to be found in the fact that the tide was not to be submitted that these should have written against miracles, for there is nothing in the world which may not be made a subject of dispute, against which objections may not be raised. The reality of physical creation and of man's existence are the plainest of truths, and yet these have been denied. Pyrrhonism, of unbelief, has been embraced by such men as Arcesilas, Carneades and Berkley. Pagan, the basis of certainty, he was willing, is variously assigned. Socrates placed it in one thing; Plato, his disciple, in another, Aristotle in a third; while Democritus denied the existence of all truth. Such learned doctors are in keeping with that of the Chronicle. Infidelity has always had its subterfuges circumstance attending the giving of the divine law on Mount Sinai by the Almighty, and of course he would have to be on the top of the mountain, and of course he would have to be there in person. At one shock the cloud that covered the mountain and encased the legislator from the eyes of the people. How natural are such scientific explanations; but how the thunder and lightning were got up for the occasion, and how exactly explain. Perhaps Chronicle could.

There, a certain learned professor says: This tells us that the miracle performed by the cripple at the golden gate could be explained away. Peter and John, he tells us, fellow was only playing possum; when Peter and John having threatened him with the laws—if He should stop the earth in its motion, or the stars in their course—that he would not be thus effected in the least. Immutability! Were this the case, the cosmos would be the most ridiculous imaginable. It would be that the Almighty would do by the agency of others what he could not do by himself. God is to be remembered was free in the creation of this world; he was not compelled to call matter into existence, and consequently he is free and can with a great ease change, alter or suspend the laws governing the same, as he could call them into being.

An example or two may possibly make this clearer to those who are not contrary to say of the laws of nature, but in harmony therewith, that disease affecting our system should be cured by the application of remedies. The knowledge of these remedies and their proper application is what CONSTITUTES MEDICAL SKILL.

But suppose an individual case, where, by the application of the ordinary known remedies, it would take several months to effect the change—who will be ready to say that He who conferred on the medicines, the sanatory power of which I speak could not himself instantaneously effect the disease. Bid God, by conferring curative properties on created things, direct Himself of its new creation—but He by doing so would himself never to produce effects other-wise than by them? The plant that springs from the seed requires a certain time to come to maturity, but it would be absurd to affirm that He who appointed that time could not as readily have appointed any other or to have caused it grow instantaneously. It does not, then, argue any immutability in God to work miracles.

In my next—for, with your permission, I will write another letter on this subject, I will show that miracles have always existed in the Catholic Church. If the Chronicle should take exception to anything I say, I beg him to wait till I have said all I desire on the subject, in order that I may not be drawn into a side issue. But if then he should have any objections to make to any of your pages, I am ready to meet him, promising, however, that he avows his belief and tells us candidly that he is no Protestant; and if the latter, to what age he restricts the existence of miracles.

The first shad caught in 1872 was also sold to the same party, and for the same price.

THE REBELLION OF SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART FIFTH.

When Sir John Talbot was led out from the dungeon into which he had been so roughly thrust a few moments before, his first impression was that he was about to be carried to execution, and he strove to bear himself with as much self-possession as a man in so dreadful a condition might. Had his thoughts been less occupied with this belief, he would not so long have overlooked the change of manner exhibited by his conductors. Those who had dragged him thither with savage violence at the command of Parez, now led him forth almost complaisantly on the orders of their new warden. But he suspected nothing less than the rope or the axe, until they reached the barbican. When they entered the archway, however, his fears of immediate execution were removed, but he felt persuaded that he was about to be given up, perhaps on an exchange of prisoners, to the English. But, the bridge was not let down —did they, then, mean to throw him into the moat?—no; they led him up a narrow stair in the thickness of the wall, and out into an apartment, the floor of which was still shaking from the recoil of a piece of cannon, discharged immediately before they entered. The place was full of smoke and crowded with men; he recognised voices that he knew through the tumult; they were those of some of his own company that he had commanded at Artane —surely they could mean him no harm! But why pursue his fancy through all the mazes of doubt and wonder that perplexed him from this moment till Art's final explanation of his release, and Ellen's first half inexplicable welcome back to his arms? She was in an inner apartment, stunned by the wife of her rescuer, the new commander of the fortress. The thickness of the walls, and the situation of the place, rendered it secure against the random shot of the besiegers, but the report of every piece discharged from the sol-joining gallery rung through it with stunning intensity; still, as the safest spot on that side of the castle, it was considered a fortunate thing that it had been assigned them, and they, as wives of soldiers accustomed to the tumultuous occurrences of war, endured the hardship of their condition without complaint.

But although Talbot and his lady had thus escaped the most imminent peril that had lately threatened them, they were still in a state of great danger and distress; for whether the castle should be held or lost, he must, sooner or later, fall into the hands of those who, if they could not look upon as enemies; and, in addition to this, and under any circumstance, poor Ellen had the prospect of finding that she was now to be an even worse misfortune rendered inviable by the impossibility of making a reconciliation for the statement of the Church's pardon. The warden, however friendly, was bound to hold them like prisoners till the arrival of Lord Thomas; even had he been willing to countenance their escape, the close form of the two guards prevented the possibility of effecting it; for, by the second morning of his siege, they had placed a fresh commander, or intercepted every avenue, while numerous and vigilant bands patrolled the whole circuit of their little fort, to make to break of day. The siege went on with this prospect of success on the English side for a week. Parez was still confined from the effects of his wound, and unable to take any part in the command of the garrison; the son of Connagher accordingly continued to exercise his authority unquestioned; he acted, therefore with the greatest majority of the men, and was obeyed with alacrity and cheerfulness; in the intervals between operations went on too successfully under his superintendence to admit any murmur among the sullen crew of the wounded warden. Parez, nevertheless, received every needful attention and kindness from his successor, and Art took frequent occasion to declare his purpose of surrendering his acquired authority the moment his old possessor should be able to resume the exercise of it. Accordingly on the first day of Parez's convalescence he had his own bed in his own apartments in the keep. MacConnaghar-ny-ny his name, with an account of the state of affairs, and asked to have his orders as when he had been only second in command.

In two days after, Parez made his first appearance on the walls. He was pale and haggard—his head was bandaged, and he was still unable to bear the weight of a helmet; but, when seeing in the distance the danger of such exposure, he proceeded leaning on Sheridan's arm, to the walls. The men received their wounded commander with that respect which soldiers ever pay to those who have the marks of service. The short but mortifying alienation between him and his officer was already half forgiven, as MacConnagher hoped, during his command, studiously disconcerned all allusion to the subject, and the excitement of the siege had all along prevented much attention to anything beyond the passing events of the hour. Parez received the congratulations of his garrison with apparent indifference, or if any emotion was perceptible, it was but the uneasiness of conscious humiliation. Still he resumed his command with every appearance of having determined to make up for its temporary loss by fully exercising it now. Every post was rigidly inspected, and many alterations made in the existing disposition of the defenses partly, as it seemed, to mak a show of confidence in his authority, and partly to express his disapprobation of the steps taken by his lieutenant.

But what is the more gratuitously asserted it might be could not have feared to see disputed, by directing changes, many of them manifestly for the worse, he did not venture on a repetition of any of those demarcks which had been originally resisted, and when the son of Connagher, in the course of his duty as warden of the barbican, received him at the entrance of his post, he heard that functionary's report, and heard his orders without one shudding to their dispute or its causes. His looks, however, were full of its recollection, and it needed no scrutinising eye to read through their forced calmness a deep and implacable purpose of revenge. Art saw this, but the soldiers that are always about him, would, I suppose, stand by the warden in a plight that his peace was far from being made; but he held no such opinion. Art was perfectly satisfied with the justice of his course to his people, and exceedingly his first care after Parez's return was to take the most effectual the security of those whom he feel at such a risk—under his protection.

Sir John and his lady had gone early in the gallery of the upper story, the only spot about the castle where the freshness and sunshine could be enjoyed in safety, and rather more generous plan than had led to seek them. It was with he did so, for the small portion of which the arches of an ancient square keep right in the rear of Parez's to went his rounds. The warden had been passing along by the upside-side, occasionally viewing the country through the embrasures of the parapet wall, when, on looking round, his eyes were suddenly arrested by the sight of the captives. They were standing where the sun light fell on the floor of the gallery through one of its open arch-ways, and were looking out in the direction of the mountains. They seemed unconscious of the presence of the warden's party, for the platform was overgrown with grass, and their footsteps were heard by him and the din of the siege resounding from the other side of the castle. It was like the thread of a knife to Parez to see them, for Talbot's arm was around his wife's waist, and she had her head clasping her to his side, the fresh fire to blow out her ringlets, till they lay waving and wantoning on his shoulder, and some sudden emotion had made the unwonted blood mantle on her cheek, till she looked even more purely beautiful than when in the unimpaired bloom of her happy pleasidays. Talbot was pointing to the hills; they were talking of their prospects should Skeffington be forced to raise the siege, or let as he was not without hopes in that event, to set at liberty by Lord Thomas. They were, meanwhile, in perfectly security —neither arrow nor bullet had fallen on that pile form since the commencement of the siege, and the gallery overlaid was proof against cannon shot.

"Should he play the part of his father's son, Ellen," said the knight, alluding to the expected soudden of Lord Thomas, "we may walk the deer together yet, over yonder blue hills of Wicklow."

"How lovely they look,"she exclaimed, "and how unconscious of our woes and sins, is it not strange that with all this rattle in my ears, I had forgotten its siege for a moment, while looking at them? But listen—how the cannon thunder! Are you sure we are not in danger here?"

"We were safe in the barbican," said Talbot, drawing her nearer within his arm, and leading away more suddenly than even her timidity had desired; for, as he turned his eyes to avoid the sight of more bloody scenes, they encountered the scowl of their hated enemy fixed upon them with baleful intentness; it passed in that moment of the white scarf that bound his bruised and livid forehead. At the same moment Art, who held their protector coming forward from the farther end of the gallery, and signing to his men to leave him in his way; and he too, ere observe Paris, but ere they had advanced more than a few steps, he stood before them. Ellen shrieked, for he was a ghastly spectacle. Some strong emotion had burst the half-cleared wound, and the blood was oozing from the edges of the discolored bands, and trickling down the side of the face; and as he spoke in the low, his eyes burned with the live fire of unquenchable malignity. He muttered some words, scarce intelligible, and, with an impatient motion of his hand, summoned his attendants. Sheridan and Tyrrel advanced, but the son of Connagher was at his side as soon as they.

"No please your nobleness," said Art, "I would fain have your commands regarding the disposal of this child and this lock upon the gateway; this noble knight and his lady, who are in my custody (laying strong emphasis on the word), have need of their accommodations, and the bulk of these commodities take up unnecessary room."

Parez turned fiercely on his lieutenant as he spoke, but the imperious severity of his glance gave way as he read the firm confidence of the looks that confronted him. He cast his eyes round the captives had been standing to the side of the gallery, and attendant soldiery of the guard looked on with aspects of significant indifference he saw the risk of again tampering with a mutinous state of affairs, and asked to have his orders as when he had been only second in command.

In two days after, Parez made his first appearance on the walls. He was pale and haggard—his head was bandaged, and he was still unable to bear the weight of a helmet; but, when seeing in the distance the danger of such exposure, he proceeded leaning on Sheridan's arm, to the walls. The men received their wounded commander with that respect which soldiers ever pay to those who have the marks of service. The short but mortifying alienation between him and his officer was already half forgiven, as MacConnagher had, during his command, studiously disconcerned all allusion to the subject, and the excitement of the siege had all along prevented much attention to anything beyond the passing events of the hour. Parez received the congratulations of his garrison with apparent indifference, or if any emotion was perceptible, it was but the uneasiness of conscious humiliation. Still he resumed his command with every appearance of having determined to make up for its temporary loss by fully exercising it now. Every post was rigidly inspected, and many alterations made in the existing disposition of the defenses partly, as it seemed, to mak a show of confidence in his authority, and partly to express his disapprobation of the steps taken by his lieutenant.

But what is the more gratuitously asserted it might be could not have feared to see disputed, by directing changes, many of them manifestly for the worse, he did not venture on a repetition of any of those demarcks which had been originally resisted, and when the son of Connagher, in the course of his duty as warden of the barbican, received him at the entrance of his post, he heard that functionary's report, and heard his orders as

The following is a summary of the dimensions of what this magnificent edifice will be when completed: The style is purely mediæval Gothic, cruciform, with wings, nave aisles and clear-story, without the modern deformity of a gallery, the clear-story being supported by two rows of clustered iron columns, resting on base of solid masonry. Its whole length, including the Chapel of the Blessed Sacrament on the northeast corner, is 864 feet; the length of the nave exclusive of chapel, 320 feet; width from transept to transept, 160 feet; with nave, and aisles, 90 feet; height to the ridge-pole, 120 feet. There are two main towers in front, with glittering spires surmounted by crosses, and one turret, all of unequal height. The principal tower on the southwest corner is 320 feet. The turret rises near the main entrance, and on the northwest corner another tower ascends 200 feet—all of solid masonry, the massive walls eleven feet thick. The interior of the church will be grand and beautiful. The lofty ceiling is finished in open roof style, and elegantly ornamented in oil and gold, the lower part of the edifice, sanctuary, pews, etc., all will be solid and substantial. The high altar will be of beautiful Italian marble. Twenty large and fifty-two small windows, filled with stained glass, will cast their mellowed brightness through the edifice. The entire cost of the structure will, it is reported, probably exceed $2,350,000.

Medical Blunders.

From the period when surgeons applied their saives to weapons instead of wounds to the present widespread age, the medical profession has often unwillingly taken side with disease in its conflicts with the human system. Even yet, in spite of the teachings of centuries of experience, many physicians believe in depleting their patients, already seriously exhausted by sickness, with powerful cathartics, exercise, and waste, cauterial plasters, or the lancet. But, providentially, public intelligence is ahead of these homicidal fossils, who belong, of right, in the era of the Crusaders. The powerful curative properties in herbs and the essence of sick ness, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has opened the eyes of the masses to the importance of increasing the vital strength of the body instead of lessening it. Many of the diseases to which when the atmospheric conditions are adverse to health, it is liable to prevail, are of a bilious type, but the unfortunate result of that is the best known safeguard against all the atmospheric elements of disease.

The Catholics of the Diocese of Westminster, in the city of London, have provided Archbishop Manning with a suitable palace in Westminsar. It is situated in York place and in Cardinal Wiseman's old residence in Golden Square. The Archbishop's residence will be on a much larger scale than usual. The income of the see of Westminster is said to be about £3,000 a year, but £200 is sufficient for his own economical household; the balance he dispenses in charity.

Professor Draper, professor of chemistry and physiology in the University of New York, has written a book of over six hundred pages on "The Intellectual Development of Europe," and the learned editor of the New York Freeman's Journal has challenge him and the whole medical faculty of the University to name any fifty consecutive years, from page 353 to 590 in the volume, and he undertakes to prove that they will be found to contain three hundred palpable errors in fact, both parties to agree on three lawyers of high standing in New York to sit as a court of referee, the decision of any two of them to be final, and the disputant who loses his case to pay the lawyers for their services. Professor Draper is a great light among the Rationalists. Will he suffer his fame to be clouded by backing down from this challenge? We believe he will.

MISCELLANEOUS IRISH NEWS.

Lord Inchiquin has been elected an Irish representative peer in the room of Baron Kilmaine.

Mr. Murphy, M. P. for Cork, has received a letter from the Premier, stating that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to contribute £100 to the testimonial fund to be given to Maguire, M. P.

London correspondents of the Dublin journals speak in high terms of the ability displayed by Isaac Butt, Q.C., M.P., on the Irish members, before the House of Commons.

The Ballina (county Mayo) quarter sessions opened Thursday, April 9th, but owing to there being no criminal case for trial, the Ballinrobe there was only one criminal case, and a Castlebar the trivial one.

The result of the election for Tyrone is as follows: Captain Corry (Conservative) 3,139; Macartney (Home Rule) 3,103. Captain Corry therefore succeeds to the uncle in the representation of the county.

A great "Tennant Conference" was to be held in Dublin on the 17th inst. under the presidency of McCarthy Downing, M. P. The Freeman's Journal says that the purpose of the meeting will be fully expressed, and that a large number of M. P.'s were to be present.

Edward O'Kelly, whose trial at the last commission in Dublin, for attempting to shoot Denis Murphy, of the Irishman, resulted in a disagreement, was again arraigned on the same indictment. The evidence adduced was similar to that given on the first trial, and the jury were a second time discharged without being able to agree to a verdict.

His Excellency, the Lord Lieutenant, will, on the invitation of the Mayor, and the Harbor Commissioners of Limerick, visit that city on Wednesday, May 14th, on which day there will open the new Grating Dock, which has been built out of the solid rock by Mr. John Long. Though one of the largest in Ireland—being 400 feet in length and 25 feet in depth—it has cost but £20,000, whereas much smaller docks in other places have cost four times the amount.

The Boston Cathedral.

The following is a summary of the dimensions of what this magnificent edifice will be when completed. The style is purely mediæval Gothic, cruciform, with wings, nave aisles and clear-story, without the modern deformity of a gallery, the clear-story being supported by two rows of clustered iron columns, resting on bases of solid masonry. Its whole length, including the Chapel of the Blessed Sacrament on the northeast corner, is 264 feet; the length of the nave exclusive of chapel, 230 feet; with from transept to transept, 160 feet; with nave and aisles, 90 feet; height to the ridge-pole, 120 feet. There are two main towers in front, with glittering spires surmounted by crosses, and one tower, all of unequal height. The principal tower on the southwest corner is 320 feet. The turret rises near the main entrance, and on the northwest corner another tower seconds 200 feet—all of solid masonry, the massive walls eleven feet thick. The interior of the church will be grand and beautiful. The lofty ceiling is finished in open roof style, and elegantly ornamented with carved work. The part of the edifice, sanctuary, pews, etc., all will be solid and substantial. The high altar will be of beautiful Italian marble. Twenty large and fifty-two small windows, filled with stained glass, will cast their mellowed brightness through the edifice. The entire cost of the structure will, it is reported, probably exceed $2,250,000.

Medical Blunders.

From the period when surgeons applied their salves to weapons instead of wounds, and when, centuries ago, the medical profession has often unwittingly taken side with disease in its conflicts with the healing powers of nature, down to the present days of centuries of experience, some physicians believe in depleting their patients, carefully nurturing exhausted by nausea with powerful vomiting emetics, salivants, cathartic purgers, or the insane. But, proof at last seems to be at hand that there is a class of medical fossils, who belong, of right, to the era of the Cyclopes! That powerful medicine in its warfare with the cause of sickness, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has the power to cure of the ailments for which it claims to be a remedy, is proved by the testimony of thousands who have been benefited by disease. They understand that the accompanying assertion is no idle boast or quack health. It is wise to reinforce the system with a wholesome tonic and vitalizer that will keep the blood pure, and repel the depressing influence of an inclement temperature. If the constitutional and animal powers were always recruited in the presence of danger, the medicinal, malarious, miasmatic, and chronic rheumatism, etc., would be much less than it now is. The same with pendent croups, colds, catarrh, diphtheria, and catarrh seldom effect a lodgment in the system that is fortified by this great preventative. Hostetter's Bitters are proved the most effectual. It is not claimed that this standard tonic is a specific for the lung and throat maladies, as is for dyspepsia. Ever complaint and intermittents, but it is substantially asserted and that it is the best known safeguard against all the atmospheric elements of disease.

FARM FOR SALE CHEAP,
Located in Sierra Valley, California,
Price, $2,000.
THIS FARM EMBRACES 200 acres of arable land, 160 of which are under fence, and is situated on the road to a good board fence. There is a neat one-and-a-half story dwelling-house of five rooms and a good barn on the premises. The house is in the stage road from Marysville to Reno, and is only about 200 yards from about half way between those places, which affords a good chance for a man with a family to make a living by keeping a house. The land is of rather superior quality, within a few feet of the house, and has all been under cultivation. Adjoining it is 160 acres of Government land, subject to pre-emption, and which could, in the interim, be used as a stock range.
The improvements and land should be worth $1,000, and the whole will be sold for $2,000.
Sierra Valley is one of the prettiest mountain valleys in the State; the soil is rich, and droughts are unknown. For further particulars it is essential. A ready and big, priced market is found in the mines of Sierra county, and 40 packers for all kinds of produce.
There are ten miles more on the ranch, which will be sold separately if desired, at the same price per acre.
This is an excellent opportunity for persons of small means to acquire a comfortable home, and where in time they may become comparatively rich. The owner's reason for selling is that he must leave the State before next December. For further particulars address JOHN T. BARRY,

IRELAND.

John Martin on the National Question.

The following characteristic letter from the member for Meath, appeared in the London Morning Star, of April 28:

SIR: Your paper of this morning contains a leading article in which you recognise the importance of the Irish Home Rule question. In reading your article it occurred to me that a few comments from an Irish Home Ruler like myself may assist your English readers to understand that important question clearly. The future relations between England and Ireland, and whether those relations are to be of peace and good will, will depend upon the use which the English people make of the opportunity presented by the Irish Home Rule movement. Of course, I am on the Irish side of the question, but it will be wise by your English readers to consider it from both sides.

It is quite true that the very great majority of the people of Ireland are regard the Union Act of 1800 as the "greatest injustice to Ireland." That measure has always been so regarded by the Irish people. It was passed notoriously against their consent; and in the seventy-three years since its enactment, it has never obtained their consent. The Union has always been considered by the bulk of the Irish population as an act of usurpation, accomplished by unconstitutional and nefarious means, whereby the rights and liberties of her Majesty's Irish subjects have been placed at the disposal of her Majesty's English subjects, to be held at the mercy and caprice of the English. That usurpation has since been and still is, obeyed in Ireland, partly for the reason of the superior material forces on the side, partly for the sake of maintaining special order and avoiding violent revulsion. But the Irish people have continually, in every possible way, shown their sense of unbounded hostility to the Union. Its authority has never been established, and have continually, in some shape or other, denounced back their unabated hostility to it. Parliamentary agitation, open insurrection, and secret conspiracy have all been directed against the Union.

All orders left at the store, 146 Third street, will promptly attended to, and delivered free of expense to any part of the city.

Early Civilization of Ireland.

An interesting lecture on the "Early Civilization of Ireland" was recently delivered by J. Goulding, Esq., before the Celtic Society of London. Recapitulating as much as is known of the history of Ireland prior to the Christian era, the lecturer remarked that, even then, Ireland had a glorious past. Adverting to the old kings of Kerry, Tuath de Danaans, Ida Fail, the Phœnicians, Pentus Pearse, he showed that Ireland was the first to avail herself of the civilization brought to Europe by the Phœnician traders. The Irish had the use of letters long prior to the Christian era. Recent discoveries proved the inscriptions (which had puzzled so many antiquarians) among the tombs of Etruria to be akin to the language of the Celtic race, who were spread over a great part of Europe in the earliest times. The ancient name of the Irish was the worship of the sun and fire, traces of which were discovered even in Christian times, after they had been taught by St. Patrick to adore "God's verum Jesum Christum." The lecturer quitshable fire of St. Bridget, the mystic fires lighted at Tara, and the fires annually kindled on May Eve, upon the Feast of St. John, were referred to the same endeavour to keep up an ancient practice of Paganism. The round towers were likewise regarded as of Phœnician origin, and originally connected with sun worship, but with four windows at the top, looking North, East, South and West, whereas they were originally built for astronomical purposes. They were afterwards to have been used as places of refuge in times of danger, and to have been used as monasteries, many of them being surrounded by a circle of graves. The lecturer went on to trace, step by step, the ancient civilization of Ireland, the Celtic literature which was the result of holy wells, so intimately connected with popular Christian tradition in Ireland, as also the ancient customs derived from the winds have the least play. In tiermany and Russia the vines are—as in Spain and Italy—the chief—and in Ireland—the only fruit in the valleys.

Until lately all the farmers living on the hills and the owners of land illiate to the importance of careful study of the habits of the warm belt, and of the causes of its exemption, partial or complete, from the frosts. The fuller knowledge and thorough understanding of the natural laws governing the distribution of frost might be of great value to California, by enabling her to decide what areas specially adapted to the cultivation of tropical and sub-tropical fruit.—Athenæum.

Letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury to Ambrose Lisle Phillipps.

THE ESTATES OF CARDIGO.
Translated from the Italian.

"On early as the autumn of the year 1833, her confessor observed incidentally that the part of the hands where the wounds often wards appeared began to sink in, as it under the pressure of some external body, and also that they became painful and frequently attacked by cramps. He conjectured from these appearances that the stigmata would eventually appear, and the latter faithful his expectations, for in the Carnifice, February 2, 1834, he found her holding a cloth, with which from time to time she wiped her hands, frightened like a child at what she saw there. Perceiving blood upon the cloth, he asked her what it meant? She replied, that she did not know herself; that she must have hurt herself so as to draw blood; but, in fact, these were the stigmata, which therefore continued upon her hands, and shortly afterwards made their appearance upon her feet, and to these, at the same time, was added the wound upon the heart. The manner in which her confessor, Father Capistran, deals with her is so simple, so far from aiming at the marvelous, that he did not even inquire when had passed within her to give occasion to these wonderful appearances. They are nearly round, but a little extending lengthwise, from three to four lines in diameter, and are scattered over both the hands and feet. Drops of clear blood frequently flow from these wounds on Thursday evenings and Fridays; on other days they seem covered with a sort of crust of dry blood, without the least appearance of inflammation, ulceration, or any vestige of tympa.

"She concealed this circumstance, as she concealed in general whatever could reach the state of her interior. But in 1833, during the passage of a solemn procession, ecstacy of jubilation appeared in her; she was seized by it in the presence of several witnesses, who beheld her, like a glorious angel, scarcely touching the bed with the points of her feet, splendid as a rose, her arms extended in the form of a cross, plunged in the joys of love. All present could then see the stigmata upon her hands, and the miracle could no longer be kept secret. Her only nourishment consists in a few grapes or other fruit, or a little bread taken when pressed by want, or at the command of her confessor. The first time that I went to see her, I found her in the position in which she passes the greater part of the day, kneeling at the foot of her bed, and in ecstacy; her hands were folded on her breast, and thus displayed the stigmata; face was turned towards the crucifix, and looking a little upward, her eyes raised toward heaven, expressed such profound entrancement as nothing could disturb. There was no movement perceptible in her frame, except that of breathing, or of the pulsation. Occasionally there was a slight oscillation. It was a spectacle which could only be compared to that of angles in prayer before the throne of God. It cannot be astonishing that it should produce the strongest impression upon all who witness it; indeed the hardest hearts cannot resist it, and piety, astonishment and joy have caused rivers of tears to flow around her. I was assured by the directors of her conscience, and by her curate, that in her ecstacies during the last four years she has been accustomed employed in contemplating the life and passion of Christ, and honoring the holy sacraments. The most frequent object of her contemplations is the passion of the Redeemer; this produces the profoundest impression upon her, and is most vividly expressed upon her exterior. Particularly during the holy week, her whole being seems penetrated, and the images in her soul act forcibly upon her whole frame. It is, however, not only during this week that she is lost in the contemplation of this mystery; it occupies her every Friday, and thus offers a frequent opportunity for observing its effects. The action begins at early as the morning of Friday; at first its progress is genile and regular, but as it becomes more painful and overpowering, the image by which it is represented assumes a deeper and more clearly defined character as all is fearless; and when a tenth hour of death arrives, and anguish has penetrated the depths of the soul, the image of death appears in all the lineaments of this woman. She is upon her knees on the bed, her hands crossed on her breast, around her is perfect silence, scarcely broken by the breathing of those present; you would then suppose that for her the vein of life was setting. She is very pale during the whole action, but toward its close the paleness increases; the sighs which seem to struggle from her chest show that the oppression is becoming stronger; large drops gather in her fixed eyes, and steal slowly down her cheeks, the mouth opens more and more with slight movement. Her sighs now change into a moaning that wrings the heart: a flesh of deep red suffuses her cheeks, and swollen tongue seems glued to her parched palate—convulsions become more violent, and more intense—the hands, which at first were sinking by degrees, now drop more rapidly—the nails then blue—the fingers convulse convulsively—the rattle of death is heard in her throat; still, at long intervals, a few sighs seem to burst from the organs that death has stiffened. The last is about to escape from the bleeding heart, already bearing all the signs of death: drops in complete exhaustion; her appearance is no longer to be recognized, and this state continues for about two minutes. The head is then drawn up, the hands rise towards the breast, the face assumes its outline and its tranquillity. She is kneeling, her eyes raised to heaven, occupied in offering to God the homage of her gratitude. The scene takes place every Friday; and though essentially the same, there is ever some slight variation, which seems to express the state of her interior life. There is nothing studied in this action; it arises naturally from the depths of the woman's nature, as water flows from a fountain in the rock. It is impossible to perceive anything false, forced, or exaggerated in the whole of this representation. I have no doubt of its reality, she could not die otherwise.

"If however entirely she may be absorbed in her contemplations, a single word from her confessor, or from any other person spiritually connected with her, is sufficient to recall her to herself, without his being able to observe the transition. It takes but the necessary time to recollect herself and open her eyes, and she is as if her ecstacy had never existed; the expression of her face changes; you might fancy her a sweet child who had retained her candor and simplicity. Accordingly the first thing she does, when she recovers and sees herself ink would fly to hide them on the approach of its monitor; my heart rejoices at the sight of joy and the guilelessness of childhood, and her look is so open that you seem able to penetrate the very depths of her soul, and to convince yourself that there exists no fraud in its most remote recesses, there is no trace in her of exaggeration, hypocrisy, or weak, sensitiveness, all calm or pride. It is the simplicity expression of youth, whose serene candor has been preserved by simplicity and innocence.

"I am convinced that she is not subject to an ecstasy. I must not, however, be supposed that on account of these meditations and exercises of piety, she neglects the cares of her family, from her feel the responsibilities of her house, of which she formerly divided the management with a sister, of whom death has deprived her. Her numerous and generous ventions of some charitable persons procured for her a small property, and as she wants nothing for herself, she spends this income upon the education of her brothers and sisters, whom she has placed in different institutions according to their dispositions. Every day, towards noon, she visits the poor of the town, all crowd around her with affection. Her confessor recalls her to herself, and she converses with him upon the affairs of the

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

The Chinese question stands much better for the people of San Francisco now than it did two years ago. The improvement made in the interim indicates the good effected by patience and sensible argument. If, as some hotheaded individuals desired, the turbulence, riot and bloodshed had been used to check the Mongolian immigration, the government would have been compelled to protect the Celestials, and a great deal of odium would naturally have been incurred by those opposed to them. The consequence, of course, would be that prejudice and bitter feeling on both sides would prevent the Chinese question from being decided, as it ought to be and must be, on its merits alone. Two years ago the public journals, with a few honorable exceptions, were daily filled with high-sounding eulogiums upon the interesting race of foreigners. Their docility, their industry and aptness at learning, their honesty, their sobriety and attention to business, were descanted upon to glowing terms. A great future was predicted for them because they seemed fitted by nature to supply certain wants of the whole community. They were to do away altogether with feminine domestic help and reign supreme in the kitchens, replacing the "Biddies," as the honest and hard-working servants girls were contemptuously called. They would not copy the fashions of the lady of the house, nor have relations to call upon them; nor, above all, want time to go to Mass on Sunday. Then, again, in the capacity of laborers mechanics and artisans, they were to work for such wages as would hardly be sufficient to pay for the food of a dog belonging to a white man, and never trouble their employers with such unpleasant things as strikes. Hence they brought joy into the souls of capitalists, to whom they were the very personification of cheap labor.

While ideas like these were prevalent, it was worse than useless for those who could see below the surface, and detect the danger to our civilization and institutions lurking in the Celestial influx, to cry out for the abrogation of the treaty with China. They were treated, as might be expected, as noisy demagogues and disturbers of the public peace, and they were told very plainly that if the Chinese were attacked, their assailants would be shot down to the streets without mercy. But, fortunately for the city, no riot was even attempted, so there was no occasion for fusillading. How true is it that time works wonders! What a vast change in public sentiment has been wrought by the experience of the past two years or thereabouts! The Mongolians have been tried in every capacity, and have been on all hands pronounced failures, if not something worse. As domestic servants they have turned out abominably dishonest, stealing whatever valuables were left in their reach and, then disappearing. Their repulsive habits have destroyed every vestige of confidence in their culinary abilities. So they are being ejected from the kitchens very rapidly. Then the capitalists and manufacturers have discovered that "John" will not spend very much time making money for them, preferring to make it for himself as soon as possible. For this reason he will remain in any employment only long enough to master the intricacies of the business; but the moment he fancies he has learned them, he sets up shop on his own account and runs rival to his quondam instructor. Hence the would-be capitalists and manufacturers are grievously disappointed in the much-vaunted Celestial. To put the climax upon his shortcomings, it has been discovered that he, whether practicable, ignores the traditions of this country, establishes courts and tribunals to suit himself, punishes criminals after his own peculiar fashion, and, moreover, indulges in riot and murder to a fearful extent. So, not to put too fine a point on it, "John" is thoroughly played out. He has been tried and found wanting. His is but the closing of an end which we knew long ago would come sooner or later. We were convinced that labor was not desirable, or even profitable, simply because it happened to be cheap. Cheapness, like everything else, may be bought too dearly, and so has it been with Chinese labor. The white man has to realize nothing to fear from the competition of other races. They may work nominally for a lower figure, but in the end he will be found to be the most economical producer. It takes a little time and a great deal of patience, sometimes, to prove this, but that is all. There is no need of endeavoring to demonstrate it by the argument of physical force, and to resort to such is the height of folly. But now that the Chinaman is a nuisance and a danger, we are anxious to hear how our legislators are going to get rid of him.

To-morrow (Sunday) his Grace the Archbishop will administer the Sacrament of Confirmation at Woodland, Yolo county.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND DEVOTION.

The sanctity which the Catholic Church attaches to the bond of marriage has recently received a most instructive exemplification in Ireland. The circumstances of the case are so remarkable that we think it worth while to bring them under the notice of our readers. Some few years ago Captain VIVIAN, a member of one of the most wealthy and aristocratic families in England, married a young lady of rank and station equal to his own. The pair did not live happily together, the husband, it is said, not being the most gentlest or most affectionate partner in the world. Among the intimate acquaintances of the couple happened to be the Marquis of Waterford, and with him Mrs. VIVIAN, to use a common though often desecrated phrase, fell in love. The consequence, as might readily be imagined, was an elopement. The deserted Captain, in the usual English style, did not dream of pursuing the runaways, or of blowing the seducer's brains out, but sued the Marquis for damages, and got them to a heavy amount. His Lordship of Waterford, not in the least inconvenienced thereby, for his wealth was enormous, wrote to the friend he had so wronged, requesting him to hurry up with the divorce, as he wanted to marry the lady. This was done accordingly, and Mrs. VIVIAN became a Marchioness as soon as the letter of the law permitted. In all this, we must observe, there is little more than an illustration of the scandalously lax morality prevailing in British aristocratic circles, which, under ordinary circumstances, we would not be justified in shrinking upon our readers, but that part of the story which, in our opinion, deserves attention remains to be told. The Marchioness—who, except in the matter, undoubtly serious, of flying from her husband, appears to have been a most estimable lady—became convinced of the truth of Catholicity and wished to be received into the Church. For some time she struggled against the inclination, knowing that the Catholic Church would not recognize her divorce, and regarded her alliance with the Marquis as adulterous. Assailed by a fatal illness, however, these worldly considerations gave way, and she sent for a priest, in whom she communicated her desire. The clergyman, acting of course in strict conformity with his duty, would not receive her into the Church until she should renounce the criminality of her relations with the Marquis, and solemnly pledged herself to separate from him definitely and forever, in case God restored her to health. This acknowledgement was made, the pledge was given; and then, and only then, was the lady received into the faith and allowed to partake of the sacraments. A few days after she died, and her obsequies were celebrated with the greatest pomp and ceremony by the Catholic clergy. The Marquis, who appears to have been deeply attached to the lady, and to be the least reckless in the way of her change of creed and was present, greatly affected, at her interment. Now we believe that no Church but the Catholic would have found the grace in the lady's divorce, much less demanded separation from her second husband. But the Catholic Church is no respector of persons, and has the same law for the rich and poor, high and low. If we contrast this conduct with the free-and-easy divorce system countenanced by the Protestant denominations in this country, the comparison cannot fail to be edifying and instructive.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND MIRACLES.

To the Editor of The Monitor. In accordance with my promise, I now hasten to show that miracles have always existed in the Catholic Church. The history of the Christian religion miraculously establishes this. Every age, from the days of the Redeemer down to the present, has been illustrated by the miraculous works of eminent servants of God. But to establish, diffusively, this fact from truth, more than the three years allotted to newspaper correspondence, would be obviously required. I shall therefore confine myself to the subject in its most limited form, advancing only the essential testimony of the most prominent writers, referring the reader for further details to the authors themselves.

Apart, then, entirely from the promises of Christ to his apostles, that signs and wonders should accompany their ministry, and which commentators refer equally to that of their successors, the witness of credibility whereby we ascertain the existence of miracles in every age are similar to those that go to establish historical occurrences in general—namely, the testimony of others. The number of truths to which we assent on this motive is greater by far than we generally imagine. In fact, how much do we accept on the testimony and authority of others that comparatively little is known to us, either intuitively or by personal experience. Thus, the universally-accepted historical events of by-gone days, the established deductions of scientific inquiry, the reality of the prior existence of ancient nations, as well as the present existence of people and countries to whose shores we never have been, all rest on these grounds—are supported by these reasons. Indeed, without such a criterion of credibility could not possibly exist—the machinery of government would be immediately clogged. The administration of law and the adjudication of rights imperatively demand such a principle. For, except, however, as true in the testimony of others, a conviction of the veracity of the witnesses, of their capability of judging, as well as of their unwillingness to mislead, is necessarily demanded. When convinced of these circumstances we immediately put faith in their testimony. Not to do so would be to act contrary to reason—to reject a criterion of truth that is universally admitted.

Now, the persons who have attested to the existence of miracles in every age, from the days of the Redeemer down to the present, are men of the most undoubted veracity, honor and intelligence. Their numerous learned works which exist to the present, and may be consulted in every important library in the country, sufficiently attest their discernment, ability and intelligence, thereby relieving them from the charge of incapacity in judging of such matters. Their position on the other hand their well-known positions as champions and defenders of the truth, and as pastors and guides of the people, made it incumbent upon them to see that those entrusted to their charge were not grossly deceived or fraudulently imposed on by others. When then we find men of this class, whose testimony would be readily accepted in any court upon earth, solemnly attesting, from personal knowledge to the existence of miracles in their respective communities, we are not at liberty, unless at the expense of discarding one of the most reasonable grounds of certitude, in rejecting their testimony. As instances of those to whom I refer, the following may be taken as a sample: Tertullian, Irenæus, and Justin the martyr, in the second century; Origen and Cyprian, in the third; Augustin, Ambrose, Athanasius and Paulinus in the fourth; Basil, Jerome and Chrysostom, in the fifth; Bernard, Malachy, Philip Neri and Ignatius Loyola, and a host of others, in the middle ages and later on. That I may not be accused of quoting at random, or setting forth without proof authorities that have not witnessed to its truth, I desire to call the attention of the reader to the following:

In his book of prescriptions, or shield of Catholic faith, Tertullian, writing against the heretics of his time, scornfully taunts them with their inability to perform miracles, as were performed in the Catholic Churches. "Let them," he says, "prove themselves to be new apostles." For Christ when he appointed apostles gave them power to work the same miracles which he wrought himself. Let heretics, therefore, produce their miracles." Irenæus, a contemporary with Tertullian, also appeals to miracles as universally performed in the Church. "By their name," he says, "they exercise power in behalf of the human race, according as each has received the gift from God. For some drive away devils, so that those who have been cleansed from evil spirits frequently become believers and join themselves to the Church. Others have a knowledge of future events; they see visions and utter prophetic words. Others heal the sick by laying on their hands and restore them to health. Moreover, as I have said, the dead have been raised and remained among us for many years. What shall I more say? The number of gifts which the Church throughout the world has received from God, and in the name of Jesus Christ, crucified under Pontius Pilate, she employs every day for the benefit of the nations, neither deceiving any one nor receiving any reward for the exercise of them. For as she has freely received from God, so she freely ministers." Origen bears testimony to the existence of the same miraculous powers. In his book against Celsus he says, "I live away deity, perform many cures, foresee things to come according to the divine mind;" and then he adds, "I have seen many examples of this sort, and should I only set down such of them as were transacted in my presence, I should expose myself to the loud laughter of the unbelievers, who imagine that we, like the rest whom they suspect of forging such things, are also imposing our forgeries upon them. But God is my witness, that my sole purpose is to recommend the religion of Jesus, not by fictitious tales, but by clear and evident facts." So, also, Paulan, writing against Novatus, "Has he the gift of tongues and prophesy."

St. Athanasius in his life of St. Anthony, after relating many miraculous things, thus concludes: "The facts which I have inserted are partly from my own knowledge, for I often went to see him, and partly from the information of those who had long attended on him; in all which I have carefully adhered to the truth." Then, in the fourth century, we hear the great African doctor Augustin, speaking of the performances of miracles in his bishopric, of, myself, have I beheld them with my own eyes." And in another part of the same work, the "City of God," alluding to the miraculous cure of two persons at the tomb of St. Stephen, he says: "It is no mistake of mine, I do not think that I do not think that there is one, of all the inhabitants of Hippo, who did not see it, or hath not been informed of it, nor one that can even forget it." No less than seventy other miracles are recorded by the same writer as having occurred in his own diocese. Now, I will ask, would Augustin and the others whose names I have mentioned, have exposed themselves to the ridicule and contempt of the unbelievers of their times, unless they had the most satisfactory evidence of the truth of what they stated? Would they dare to do in the presence of their respective communities to have born testimony of this character to imaginary occurrences? Could we reasonably suppose that such a man as Augustin would call upon all the inhabitants of a considerable community to attest an untruth? Tosupp se we would be to undermine the foundation of all history, to call into doubt the best attested events of former times, to reject the authority of an Augustin, Origen, Tertullian and Justin, there is no reason why we should receive Heroditus, Pliny or Tacitus.

Theodoret, Bishop of Cyr, who lived about the same time, speaking of the miracles of Christ, says: "I was not only a spectator of his miracles, I was also a hearer of his predictions." St. Paulinus gives testimony of the miracles performed in his presence by St. Ambrose, Archbishop of Milan; and in the next, the sixth century, we have St. Chrysostom speaking in this manner: "This sign (the sign of the cross) built in the days of our fathers and our own, has thrown open the gates that were shut, destroyed the effects of poisonous drugs, dissolved the force of hemlock and cured the bites of venomous serpents." The seventh century was remarkable, among others, for the miracles performed by St. Augustine of Canterbury, as we learn from the writings of venerable Bede. The inscription on the tomb of the Saint the Bishop engraved himself, and supported by the performance of miracles, converted from the worship of idols to the faith of Christ, King Edelbert and his nation." I pass over, as too numerous, the miracles recorded by St. Jerome, St. Basil and others, and come at once to more modern times. Philip, Archdeacon of Liege, giving an account of the miraculous works performed at Cologne by St. Bernard, and primitive waver after the days of the apostles."

David Home, too, that other implacable enemy of the Christian religion, admitted the force of historical testimony on this point, for in seeking to divert the minds of his readers from the truths of religion, he says, "Those who are so silly as to examine the affair by that medium (miracles), and seek particular flaws in the testimony, are almost sure to be confounded." Another is even still more explicit in his acknowledgment of miracles. "Through the course of fifteen hundred years past," he says, "still Jews have heard that there is the Word of God, have seen the greatest signs and wonders, and have raged against them." Again, "From God we have learned and received it the Bible as the external Word and truth of God, confessed and confirmed by miracles and signs during these fifteen hundred years to this present time." And in another place, "Who can gainsay these things which God to thereby marketh witness already at the tombs of the saints?" One would imagine it was a Catholic priest, and not a Protestant, that was writing. Gratius, too, another Protestant, and certainly one of the most learned men of his time, has the following: "As the later ages also are full of testimonies of the same kind, Ludovicus, I do not know by what reason some are moved to refrain that gift to the first ages only." In like manner Osiander, Whitaker, Calvin, Isaac and Casaubon, and Protestants, frankly acknowledge the existence of miracles in every age down to their own. If to this we add the almost innumerable instances recorded in the lives of the saints, and the testimony of Catholic writers, who have sworn to by competent witnesses in the canonization of the saints, there is no reason why we should not believe the miracles to be a part of the normal history of the Catholic Church. But some one may say, "Why do we not see the miracles of the present day?" To this we reply, we do not acknowledge the truth of that doctrine in whose utterness they were performed? The reason is obvious. In their blindness they fall into the same unbelief as the Jews in the days of the Redeemer. The latter attributed the miracles of the Saviour to the power of Beelzebub; the former refer the miracles of the Catholic Church to a similar source. "The Evangelical Doctor," says Dr. Middleton, "so constantly, explicitly and unanimously affirmed by all Church historians as the continual succession of all those miraculous powers through all ages, from the earliest father who first mentions them down to the time of the Reformation, which same succession is still further declared by persons of the most eminent character, for their probity, learning and dignity in the Roman Church to this very day." This testimony coming from an infidel, and one who did all in his power to discredit the reality of miracles, is the most satisfactory and invaluable. And in another part the writer says: "If the cause must be tried by the unanimous consent of fathers, we shall find as much reason to believe those powers were continued even to the latest ages as to any others; how early from insurrection only by extraordinary pressure of soldiers and policemen. The next trouble will precipitate a crisis here. In Nice and Savory there is a good deal of dissatisfaction which is actively fomented by Italian revolutionary agents. Paris appears on the surface to be all quiet, but the extraordinary precautions taken by the authorities reveal apprehensions, and prove that there is the strongest foundation for the graves' fears.

Speculations on Affairs in France.

Judge Hoffman, of the Superior Court, has rendered a decision sustaining the demurrer interposed by James Ingersoll in the suit brought against him by the State to recover $50,000 damages for the sale of liquor to a minor, unless the country was made a party to suit, and an appeal Judge Hoffman has affirmed the decision. The case will be carried to the Supreme Court. The publication of dollars which the late Ring is said to have drawn from the New York Treasury.

A correspondent of the London News pitches the American display of the exhibition, and gives the following as a correct list of articles to be found in the Centennial Buildings at Philadelphia: Two cases of white drawers, three blankets, one pair of boots, a double-barrelled gun, two satchels, an institutes of water taken from the Mississippi river An explanation of the meagre display is found in the fact that the management of the American section, as well as the superintendence of the American section, as it is confidently hoped that now the new commissioners will be appointed in a few days actively to work to repair the evil effects, and that from now on will be speedily inspected and exhibitions from that country will be worthy of the nation.

Died, in Stourbridge, April 11th, Margaret Jane, daughter of Anthony and Margaret Smith, at the age of 19 years. Deceased was in fact, from the earliest days of her childhood, a child who knew her by her grace and amiability and her cheerful disposition. Such as well as the high respect in which her parents and all the inhabitants of Stourbridge and its vicinity, was justified in a sad and yet consoling manner by the large concourse which followed the remains of the young girl to their last resting place. The Rev. Father Hornsberg, (C. P. S. and the pastor, Dowlman, chanted the burial service. It was, perhaps, the largest funeral ever witnessed in this village to another and better world that the town has ever seen. Wednesday, died on third Friday, and was buried on Easter Sunday. It is just, had we hope, to draw therefrom an augury of the eternal happiness of her whose loss is mourned, and afflicted parents have the sincere sympathy of every one acquainted with them.—R. I. ## California-Street Excitement a Flash in the Pan.

Excitement and More than Excitement —Frenzy Bordering on Madness.

Let us look at this state of things, calmly from a philosophic point of view. Every excitement has its extra tension of the brain, naturally leading to imprudence and a reckless prodigality of the whole system. Extraordinary emotions have their primary and secondary effects. The primary fall of life and elasticity, and the next day produces a lassitude of spirits and a want of that life-giving power that should ensure a success in any undertaking. A great battle is fought, with a foe ambitious of application, becomes a driveling idiot. All this thing is going on in the minds of business men now.

A man will go to the fire each and every time. If you call it speculation, every rent he has to his name, and he is not a gambler. Those are Le Petite ize words and Le Republic ize is the latter's monopolizers.

Ruin, however, so irritated by the ambitious wishes that led to his grievous fall, and by the defeat of Marini, has all support given him ostensibly by the Government, that he does not care a few pennies, provided he can avenge his defeated wrongs. The Right is directing its efforts to postpone a dissolution of the Assembly for one or two years. The will increase its unpopularity by obnoxious laws, by the aid of agents to secure a majority in the elections.

THE REBELLION OF

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART FIFTH.—Continued.

The knight could not but remark with surprise the little interest he seemed to take in the defense; and, as he proceeded, he overheard from more than one the expression of similar astonishment. He gained the hospital suburb, and duly committed his charge to the care of the attendants. He was now to return by the same way to regain the fastness where Silken was, and had again to pass the warden. While staggering under the weight of the wounded man, and toiling through the wreck of the platform, with such difficulty as he had experienced in crossing to the hospital, the knight had not observed so much the various missiles that fell on or over the narrow road by which he was to pass, as the wary sheriff, Shall we count you as a volunteer?"

"Ma'ter Dare, I am here a prisoner," said Talbot.

"Ay, and will continue so till latter Lammas, if you count on being outraged by the Gunter," replied the warden, with a mock compassionate laugh.

Talbot turned to go, without making any reply; for he felt that he could not do so without betraying himself, which every motive now urged him to repress, as the warden's authority was momentarily increase, and it seemed doubtful, should the sally he meditated prove successful, whether Art Jamwell would much longer be able to command against it. Parez regarded him, as he went, with another glance of anxious wondering, and the knight returned to his quarters more cautious and perplexed than ever. He had not been long absent from his apartment, where he sat calming the fears of his wife, he heard the warden's voice in the gallery without. His amazement was much increased to hear the tone of cordiality in which he spoke with Art and his company. The reason, however, soon appeared; he was inviting volunteers for the sally; but so great was the willingness of the men, that, instead of requiring the interposition of fair words, as he feared, all the warden's authority to oblige a sufficient number to remain. Foremost of those who offered themselves and were accepted was Art; the best men of his company followed under Redmond and Barry Oge; while Gillaspike was obliged, much against his will, to remain as captain of the gate. Singing and shouting, the volunteers descended to the court-yard, and Talbot, again came forth and took his station by a wicket in the wall, so placed as to command the sally.

On the left flank of the English position, and occasionally disclosed as the skirts of the great cloud were rolled back or lifted by the breeze, stood a single gun behind a temporary breast-work of gabions and sandbags. It had been brought forward to supply the loss of one of the dismounted pieces in the battery, and was planted here until a place on the breaching platform should be cleared for it; but the breastwork of the breaching battery was now one shapeless mound of earth, and all its embrasures beaten down, and the ground for ten yards in front quite covered with the fire from the walls; this, however, slackening as the men were withdrawn for the sally, gave an opportunity to the English to repair the damage, and when Talbot looked forth, their sappers were swarming over the ruins of the half-cleared rampart, clearing away the rubbish of the fallen parapet, and piling up a new breastwork under the covering of the dismounted gun that has been mentioned, and for a second, similarly planted, on the other flank, both aided by a constant discharge of musquetry from the trenches behind.

Talbot had just time to observe these features of the scene below when the noise of the descending drawbridge announced the rushing of the galloglass. They sallied in two bodies, one led by the son of Connagher, the other by the warden. Parez's company took the safer service of covering the drawbridge and securing the retreat; while the division led by the Art came down long the edge of the fosse with the noise and impetuosity of a torrent, and only slackened their speed till they swept the field clean over the temporary battery, which they trampled into ruin, and on to the foot of the main breastwork itself; up it they went like a wave of the sea, and over, and down among the astonished gunners and defenders in the trench behind, with a roar of shouting and clash of arms. In the midst of the knight leap to his feet, and involuntarily join in the cheer of encouragement that rung from all the walls. For some minutes the struggles were concealed by the intervening rampart; but the din of musquet and weapons overhead was still visible above the breastwork—sword and battle axe flashed bright through the smoke, and when the blade caught the sunshine, and the white flickering of the plaids as they were waved backwards and forwards with the edifying impulses of alternate victory. At length the tide of conflict set in steadily in one direction, and the whirling sweep of the axe fell fast and faster through the thinned array of spear and battle-axe; and at last it drove their antagonists in one tumultuous mass out of the embrasures, and down into the area and platform of the breaching battery. Here, under and over the stem guns, they now poured down the sally and victory. "Ha, ne reachtaire," he exclaimed, with an animation such as he had not displayed during the siege before, "we shall have knocks at close quarters before the sun goes down! Where has the chief-engineer got to, plotting the throats of churls? let him get his skene in order; for he will have to work enough within the keep, if my spy deceive me not. Is O'Madden; I did not show you the knave's billet. Mark what an account he has given of their loss in the trenches." So saying, he plucked it forth, and handed it to his officer. O'Maddon perused the paper with evident satisfaction, and it passed from hand to hand among those who stood about the warden, each reading and some commenting on the contents.

"Slain in the battery, fifteen men and a sergeant; wounded, three-and-twenty."

"And in the trenches?"

"Twelve slain and nineteen wounded since sunrise."

"Hiersh! I knew we'd do the work when the range was altered, as I advised: if we had done so at first.—"

"What say you?—numbers of the English in our favor? By my faith, and there had need; for 'twill be safer to be friends than foes to the Ape after to day. Crown ohon!"

"What is the hour fixed for the sally?"

"In about an hour from the present time."

"Ha! the blessed bells of Saint Woolstan's, Master Parez is a good man in the gap, after all! He is going to head the sally in person."

Talbot felt the hot blood burning upon his cheek for having entertained suspicions so slanderous of the enemy. He cast his eyes to the ground, in the confusion of an ingenuous spirit, for, although he had no given utterance to a single imputation of treachery, he felt ashamed to look the warden in the face without some expiation for the injury done him even in thought. He saw, too, recollected that, while a prisoner in the fortress, his own presence there, uncalled for, might well excite just surmise. He uttered a sigh, with an air, as he felt, of more conscious condemnation than he ever remembered to have exhibited before. His uneasy steps were arrested by the voice of Parez: but the tone of the fire word more than such assertion for the knight's conscientiousness, for the warden addressed him with a loud levity, that was not less unexpressed than offensive. "Ho, ho, Sir Knight," he cried; and Talbot, looking up, encountered his glance, which was full of insolent triumph, yet why he could not conjecture. "Why, Sir Knight, we give the sally shortly. Shall we count you as a volunteer?"

"Ma'ter Parez, I am here a prisoner," said Talbot.

"Ay, and will continue so till latter Lammas, if you count on being outraged by the Gunter," replied the warden, with a mock compassionate laugh.

Talbot turned to go, without making any reply; for he felt that he could not do so without betraying himself, which every motive now urged him to repress, as the warden's authority was momentarily increase, and it seemed doubtful, should the sally he meditated prove successful, whether Art Jamwell would much longer be able to command against it. ### MISCELLANEOUS IRISH, NEWS.

The fund for the purpose of identifying the Elate Rowmare, and presenting Mr. MacAleese with a testimonial, already amounts to the sum of £1,500, and four months imprisonment for contempt of Court.

Mozart's Masses were sung at several Romanist churches in London on Easter Sunday. In one of these churches (Spanish Church, Clapham), the Lord confessions-an extraordinary Holy Saturday that a London newspaper remarks he would have preached such words he officiating in the actual metropolis.

The London Times, in a recent issue, pronounced by the Irish Home movement. It asserts that England and Ireland are not only welded but fused (and nonfuses) and that separation is impossible. The Times, not many months since, movement, which, by the way, does not mean separation, but partnership on a fair and equitable basis.

The affray between the police and civilians near Dublin on Sunday night, April 13th, turns out to have been one of desperate fury. Their swords were taken from two of the Constabulary, many of whom were severely injured, and it was only after a desperate struggle, and stag large reinforcements had come up, that the police were able to end the disturbance and carry off seven prisoners, whom they charge with being ringleaders in the affray.

The Roscommon Sessional Bar recently entertained their chairman, A. Hamill, Esq., Q. C., at Bergin's Hotel, Athlone. The health of the chairman was proposed in suitable terms, and responded to in a manner that evinced the kind feeling entertained by him toward the practitioners in that county. Several of the local magistrates were also invited to meet Mr. Hamill, and the evening was spent most agreeably.

An application was to have been made to the Court of Queen's Bench, London, on the 15th April, to make absolute the rule obtained some few weeks ago in reference to the shameful ill-treatment in prison of Bridget Bir. Matthews and Mr. Isaac Butt, were to support the application, and several of the prison officials were required to be in readiness to give evidence, if necessary in corroboration of the complaints of cruelty.

The sentences of the Belfast rioters, says the Ulster Examiner, are as follows: The total number of rioters, 74; number of prisoners, 33 years and 8 months. Total length of time of Catholic prisoners, 14 years and 3 months. Total number of Protestants convicted, 39. Total number of Catholics convicted, 35. Average punishment for each Protestant conviction, 10 months and 10 days. Average punishment for each Catholic conviction, 2 years. Protestant punishment to Catholic punishment, as 1 to 2.6. Protestant guilt to Catholic guilt—let that question be answered by the history of the August riotes, the gutting of public houses, and burnings on the Shankhill.

The Catholics do not appear to have profited by their wholesale slaughter in Derry. Indeed, and there would be little cause for regret if this were the case, since, except on the single question of remunerative labor, there are not much difference between the political programmes of Captain Gray and Mr. Macartney (who insisted on Ulster Rights), a correspondent, writing from Omagh, represents Father Clifford, parish priest of Trillick, as maintaining this view, and credits that reverend gentleman, in addition, with intention which we hope he really entertains. "He stated that, beyond voting, he had not interfered in politics, and that he described the candidates as at of one—half a dozen of the other, and consequently, at the approaching general election he would propose a Home Ruler to represent the country."

The Right Hon. Edward Bonough O'Brien, Lord Inchiquin, recently elected as a representative peer for Ireland, is the eldest son of Lucius, late lord (who was lord-lieutenant of the county of Clare, and figures in the political world as Lucius Bellenger), by his first wife Mary, daughter and heiress of Mr. William Wigget Bodkin, in the county of Clare. He was born in May, 1839, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in the ordinary degree of Bachelor of Arts. He is a magistrate and deputy-lieutenant for the county of Clare, and was lord Inchiquin married in 1862 Emily A'Court, second daughter of William, second Lord Heytesbury, but was left a widower in 1866. By her he had issue one son, Lucius Bellenger, and two daughters, Lady Victoria Charlotte Augusta Fitzroy, and Lady Florence Mary Caroline Fitzroy. The late Marchioness of Waterford was interred on the 15th April at the burying ground of the Church of Benedictine Jesuits, Curraghmore. Six Catholic clergymen officiated at the funeral, the Marchioness having joined that faith some time previous to her death. Her obsequies were attended by the principal nobility and gentry of Waterford and Tipperary, and by those tenants of the farming and tenant classes. The remains of her late lamented lord were buried with her. During the lowering of the coffins into the grave, the Marquis was entirely overcome, and he burst into a wild paroxysm of grief. It was the Marquis' desire that a High Mass should have been celebrated for the Marchioness, but as the effects of the Encumbered Estates Act operated on that particular day, he arranged that it should take place at Clones and at Portlaw in the following week.

How the Communist Prisoners are Treated.

The Pall Mall Gazette draws the following picture of the treatment which the communist prisoners at Versailles receive, and which will contrast strongly with the picture of the sufferings of the Fenian prisoners in England:

It seems that the incendiaries, cut-throats, and habitual criminals arrested after the Commune, and sentenced for ordinary offences against the common law, such as burglary, theft, or murder, have nevertheless been allowed all sorts of political privileges, and set in the same category as men like M.M. Pascbal, Thiersaet and Rouis. Pieces of linen as were accustomed to be supplied only in a fortress are well lodged and fed, and allowed to roam at their leisure over a promontory several miles in extent, which is three condemned to "simple" transportation have the free run of the whole of Nu, which covers nine square leagues. The National Assembly having, thanks to the philanthropic endeavors of the Republican party, decreed by the law of the 23rd of March, 1872, that the punishment of death shall not be compulsory, these gentlemen cost the State 628 a year apiece, and spend their time in serene idleness. They lounge about declaiming their socialist theories to one another, fish for lobsters, with which the coast is plentifully supplied, and talk without concealment of the pleasant things they shall do when an amnesty shall have set them free and opened to them the chance of taking office again. Of nourishment, desire to better their condition by cultivating the soil, or wish to improve their minds by study, there is not the slightest symptom among these down-trodden proletaires, and the fertile tracts of land which they might be profitably employed in growing will consequently remain as fallow after they have left the island as before they had come to it.

The May party of the Catholic school children came off at Captain Turner's grounds on Thursday. Miss Doyle was crowned Queen of May with the usual ceremonies. It was a scene of recreation and amusement during the day, heartily enjoyed by the children and older ones.—Cork Examiner.

OPEN-AIR SINGING IN PARIS.

—Blessed is the city that can reduce torment to pleasure, musical mendicancy to a respectable profession. This is exactly what Paris has done. Nobody can sing in the streets without special permission from the authorities, and only one hundred of these permissions may be in existence at one time. The holder of a certificate must die or retire before another may enter the ranks; and an instant arrest is the penalty of singing in the street without the precious paper in his pocket. Moreover, nothing in verse or prose may be sung or recited which doesn't bear the official stamp. Some of these open-air singers are said to have not only talent but genius. Besides having excellent voices, they are not deficient in style, and show both skill and taste in the composition of simple and amusing songs, full of local and national character. The heads of the profession usually make more than five dollars a day.

Medical Blunders.

From the period when surgeons applied their saliva to the wounds of their patients, to the present decade ago, the medical profession has often manifestly taken side with disease in its conflicts with the human system. From the days of the apothecary of centuries of experience, some physicians believe in the curative power of medicine, while others, equally as sincere, with powerful reasoning and remarkable results, practice on the latest. Surgeons, also, have their theories and practice, and the medical fossils who belong, if right in the eyes of the Creator, to the days of the Flood, are not wanting in the present day. Dr. Sanford's Liver Invigorator has opened the eyes of the medical profession to the importance of the liver in relation to health, and is now honored by disease. They understand that when the liver is out of order there is no health. It is wise to resolve the system with a thorough liver medicine, and then make it so regular and keep it regulating in harmony of an impossibility. Dr. Sanford's Liver Invigorator does what is required in the premises of a liver medicine. Very few cases require more than one bottle to restore health. Dr. Sanford's Liver Invigorator is the great liver medicine of the age. The genuine has the signature of J. H. Zeilin & Co. on the outside wrapper. Beware of counterfeits. Sold by druggists. mo10-tu

How the Communist Prisoners are Treated.

The Pall Mall Gazette draws the following picture of the treatment of the Communist convicts at present in France:

It seems that the insurgaries, cut-throats, and habitual criminals arrested after the Commune were selected for ordinary offenses against the common law, such as burglary, theft, or murder, have nevertheless been classed as political delinquents, and set in the same category as men like M. Pascal Grousset, and Rochs, Suds of them as were sentenced to imprisonment in a fortress are well lodged and fed, and allowed to roam at their leisure, over a promontory several miles in extent, while those condemned to "simple" transportation have the free run of the whole of Pin, which covers nine square leagues. The National Assembly has also voted to the philanthropic clamors of the Republican party, decreed by the law of the 23d of March, 1872, that no one of the convicts shall not be compulsory, these gentlemen shall not be compulsory, these gentlemen shall not be compulsory, these gentlemen

At Tralee, on Good Friday morning, the Passion sermon was preached in Irish by the Rev. Archdeacon Moynihan, and in the evening another discourse on the same mournful subject was delivered also in Irish by the Rev. T. Hosson, P. P., Bally—Mo-Elligot.—Weekly Register, April 19.

Death of Very Rev. Mr. Malone, P. P., V. F., Brunsbna.

It is only some two or three week since, says the Nation of April 12th, we published some letters from Father Malone, of Belmullet. We have now to record with unfeigned sorrow the death of our very reverend friend, who was one of the most estimable and useful members of the beloved and trusted body to which he belonged. And the following obituary notice of him in the last number of the Mayo Examiner:

At eight o'clock on last Wednesday morning the life of a zealous and pious priest and sterling patriot passed away. The good Father took ill on Sunday with acute inflammation of the bowels, and could not be stayed. The treacherous malady was fearless and unsparing in the discharge of the sacred duties of that mission for which he was so qualified, to which he was so constantly and zealously devoted. There was no one precedent to Father Malone in integrity of purpose. Dignified by many personal gifts of the highest order, among these a generous and hospitable disposition, he possessed a thorough education, and a great store of acquired knowledge and experience of men and things. He was learned, in the common acceptation of the word as well as in its larger and truer sense, devoted to the faith of which he was a profound and pious priest, he loved his people and the country with a genuine love that was ever visible in the luminative vigilance in the interests of faith and people that nothing seemed to escape. It was only last year that Father Malone visited America, where he worked and lectured in aid of his new church among the Irish people. Of the thousands that welcomed him in that new and free country of the Irish race many will mourn with us here the demise of a good and holy priest, whose life was wholly devoted to the service of God and country. We hope the week ones of Kerry, for whose homes he long and bravely battled, will not be so to feel too soon the want of the strong and virtuous hand of father and friend. The clergy have assembled in large numbers, and masses are being offered daily in the parish church and at the residence of the lamented deceased.

Spencer Dock.

The new dock built by the Midland Railway Company at the North Wall, Dublin, was formally opened on Tuesday by the Lord Lieutenant, in presence of a considerable gathering. The work is a striking testimony to the enterprising spirit of the company and to the scientific ability of the engineers. Our readers have been duly giving it name, a discreditable and unpublic practice was revived. We laid before readers street, and Westmoreland street, and Suffolk street, and Harcourt street, and other scenes of the kind. We confess we were hoping that this sort of misconduct was obsolete, especially in the face of such recently invented designations as Sackville street, Fontenoy street, Home Rule Terrace, Goldenbridge, Geraldine street, and O'Connell street. But the new dock has been called after Lord Spencer, who, however estimable he may be in private life, is a fellow countryman of the Grattons and the Harcourts, and, like them, the representative of a system of tyrannizing that systematically and habitually plunders Ireland. There ought to have been sufficient self-respect to call "Spencer Dock" by some Irish name.

Not Checked.

Judge Lawson's severe sentences and strong reprimands from the Bench seem to have had the effect rather of reviving secret associations than of putting them down fast. Least of all, as might have been expected, have they had the effect of making the Orangemen less turbulent and more orderly and law abiding. It appears that on Sunday evening two men wearing green neckties entered Rouen street, a Protestant district, and without, so far we can learn, having offered any provocation, were set upon by a gang of Orangemen, with the result that one of the two was dangerously wounded. The formation of one mob, of course, led to the formation of a counter one, and at a late hour a regular row was going on. The Irishman of Parts has shown itself to be very generous, and the churches on Tuesday, Friday and Saturday last, the only days in a workable spectacle well worthy of consideration. Bombay in Holy Week was especially consecrated to the particular devotion known as "the Stations." It is customary on this day to start at least three churches and to offer a particular prayer at a special altar in each church. Some of these altars were richly decorated, and especially those in the churches under the control of the Jesuit Fathers. In some parts of Bombay, notably in the south, during the days of Holy Week small tables are placed at the doors of houses with plates on them to receive their offerings. Ladies and gentlemen, dressed in the latest fashion, may often be seen reminding worshipers of the duty of almsgiving. The custom of having these small tables at the doors of houses is not prevalent in Paris, and eloquent equipages are to be seen passing the fashionable and noble personages who are reclining upon the cool soft cushions of their carriages, and thus blessing upon the cold stone pavement of the Seville. The Archbishop of Seville officiating assisted by the bishops of the Empire by the Bishop of Jaen, and St. Augustin. Formerly the Sovereigns used to attend special services in the private chapel of the Royal Palace, but since the fall of the Empire it was Monsignor Bauer, who is the representative of the Holy See, who preached the special sermons in Holy Week. In earlier times it was the custom to have sermons preached in the open air. It is to the theatres and other places of public amusement that it is now observed. At Malaga, the Bishop of Cadiz officiating, solemnities we have had concerts of sacred music. Cologne presented a curious spectacle on Holy Thursday, the cathedral was densely crowded by upwards of 4,000 persons to listen to the works of Haydn, Mendelssohn and Handel. The music was directed by Herr Braun by M. Mosenen, "Marie Madeleine," which obtained a deserved success, while at the Conservatoire the first movement of music was rendered with all the pomp and solemnity which it deserves.

Swindling the Banks.

Immediately following the raid on the Bank of England a successful coup has been made on several private banks. The foreign gang have operated more simply and successfully than the Bidwell company. A strange element of the Parisian trands is that these telegraph employés are suspected of complicity with the Communists. After a period of the first telegram cautioning against receiving more waxseem of the superscriptions. The first swindle was from the Helvetian Bank, which was duly advised by the firm of MM. Salomon, Oppenheim & Co., of Cologne, that they were in want of cash for fifty thousand francs, presented by M. Hoffman, a gentleman of highly dressed man, making a large display of jewellery and money, duly turned up in the course of the day and presented his cheque for payment. He was refused an order for the money, but was told that the cheque would be cashed. The cashier gave him twenty thousand francs, and he left, promising to return soon for the remainder. The business was gone through at the house of Messrs. Rothschild for fifty thousand francs, which was paid at once, everything being found en règle. At the Bank of Discount the same swindle was attempted, but for another object in close connection with the Bidwell affair. A gentleman, Mr. Mooney, yours respectfully, P. Tracy." Mr. Mooney, then an unnoned several other subscriptions for the expense of prosecuting the ill-treatment of P. Reddin, the total of which amounted to £19 16s. 3d., which announcement was received with loud cheers.

Two days after the fatal and lamentable occurrence of last week the buyers unconditionally abandoned their demand for a rebate of fourpence in the pound, and agreed to the old arrangement. This action was quickly followed by a meeting of the other party, at which a resolution was unanimously signed, disavowing all intention of molesting or insulting the buyers, or preventing the buyers. Thereupon business was resumed, the fleet went to sea as regularly as usual, and the town was perfectly quiet. One of the predictions of the Times—that the riot of Wednesday week would have the effect of driving away the buyers from Kinsale, and would, in other ways, inflict permanent injury on that town—was falsified in the very time they were uttered.—Nation, April 19.

Distress in the West.

Mr. Brady, Inspector of Fisheries, tells in one of our daily contemporaries a sad tale of the islands of Boffin and Shark, off the coast of Galway. The sheep have died of starvation. The people repeat plant failure. The fishing season has commenced, but the fishermen having no gear, and being unable to procure it, as during the past years, cannot go to sea. Mr. Brady therefore, appeals to the public for subscriptions to raise a fund from which loans may be made to the fishermen on their own security, and he says that not a moment is to be lost to meet the emergency.—Nation, April 19.

Autumn Manœuvres in Ireland.

It is arranged that during the autumn manœuvres in Ireland the troops stationed in the various forts and garrisons throughout that country, together with the Militia, the Army Reserve Corps and the artillery of the Royal Irish Constabulary, shall march to attack the Curragh Camp. It is expected that the great struggle will be waged near Bessington, a district admirably adapted for military operations. The forces under arms will probably exceed 12,000.—Other.

ENGLAND.

The Home Rulers at Gosting Hall and the case of Daniel Reddin.

At a recent meeting of the Home Rule Association at the above hall Mr. Mooney read the following correspondence. A telegram from Mr. Munster, M. P., was received for the expense of prosecuting the torturers of Daniel Reddin. He next read a letter from the Rev. P. Tracy, of Hyde, Manchester, in which he (Father Tracy) had undertaken to forwarding the indicted P. O. Order for £5 10s., the first collection in Hyde of the sympathizers of the unfortunate Irishman, Daniel Reddin. If those patriotic Irishmen were desirous for the prosecution, it was not for lack of sympathy on the part of indignation as the other, but because their exchequer was low. Mr. Mooney, for another object in close connection with the Bidwell affair. A gentleman, Mr. Mooney, yours respectfully, P. Tracy." Mr. Mooney, then announced several other subscriptions for the expense of prosecuting the ill-treatment of P. Reddin, the total of which amounted to £19 16s. 3d., which announcement was received with loud cheers.

FRANCE.

Holy Week in Paris.

The French correspondent of the Times, writing about the manner in which Holy Week has been spent in Paris this year, mentions some interesting facts—not the least interesting of which is narrated in the lines we have italicised:

Mgr. Guibert, archbishop of Paris, presided at the Holy Week, and the Opera, Theatre Français, and Opera Comique have this year followed their example. We believe it is true that these three theatres receive subventions from the State, whilst others are dependent entirely upon the receipts of each evening's performance. Whether this is a mark of deference towards that portion of the population which has retained its faith, or a sign that we are about to be disestablished in earnest, we do not pretend to say, but it is worth noting. Bombay in Holy Week was especially consecrated to the particular devotion known as "the Stations." It is customary on this day to start at least three churches and to offer a particular prayer at a special altar in each church. Some of these altars were richly decorated, and especially those in the churches under the control of the Jesuit Fathers. ### THE HOME RULE MOVEMENT.

On the evening of April 18th a meeting of the members and friends of the Home Rule Association was held in the Rotunda, Dublin. There was a very large attendance, the body of the room being fully occupied and the gallery crowded, the audience being principally several ladies. On the platform were Isaac Butt, Mitchell Henry, R. P. Rumerhassett, P. J. Smyth, P. Callan, Rev. Professor Galbraith, A. L. Macadam, John A. Waldron, C. Dennehy, M. Keane, Mr Egan, Bruce, Captain Morgan, Athy; A. J. Kettle, Malahide; A. Webb and P. F. Johnson, Kenturk; W. H. O'Sullivan, Kilmallock; J. W. O'Connell, Charleville; W. Bolster, Athlone, Llanerch; T. Gregham.

Shortly after eight o'clock, on the motion of Mr. George Delaney, seconded by Mr. A. M. Sullivan, the chair was taken, amid loud applause, by Mr. Isaac Butt. The chairman said he would detain them only a short time. They would be glad to learn that a most gratifying document had reached the council of the Home Rule Association that day from a body of respected Catholic clergy in the West, and this document their efficient honorable secretary would bring before them. Since their opponents say what they would, the movement was spreading in England. It was rapidly progressing among their countrymen in England, and they might depend that at the next general election the Irish vote in England would be a power that English politicians would be obliged to respect. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. A. Webb, the Secretary, read the following letter from the Very Rev. Dean MacManus, of Clifden:

To affirm that the clergy and people of Connemara are now converts to Home Rule would be a simple misconception. They are humbly venture to hope that they, along with their fellow countrymen, will be allowed to occupy a place within the confines of common sense, and that they can therefore understand that the total overthrow of domestic life cannot be as well managed by deputies from distant and hostile localities as by the owners themselves, unless, indeed, a writ of lunatico inquirendo had been issued against them or some of them, by a party of plain, palpable reasoning. The natural concerns of Ireland will not be managed as well by any foreign nation, even supposing that foreign nation can be supposed theoretically to be animated by the two most deadly influences, namely, self-interest, internecine national animosity, and inexhaustible religious hate. No doubt we have been tardy in joining the patriotic movement; but we beg to state, and we pledge ourselves to endorse hitherto the cordiality of feeling displayed by the Orange and Catholics towards each other on the occasion being cheered to the echo.

Mr. Callan moved the next resolution. Since his entrance into Parliament he had deeply felt the necessity of organization, not alone among the Irish members, but in Irish constituencies. Irishman though he was, he had to admit that the principal characteristic of the Irish members was political inconsistency, and, he regretted to say, political disloyalty. If they wished to have good and honest representatives they should organize and relieve independent candidates from the present heavy tax upon them. Speaking not alone for Louth, but for the north generally, he could see that the friends of Ireland would be generally returned. The resolution which he had been asked to propose was: "That we earnestly recommend the friends of Home Rule in the several constituencies to take immediate steps to ascertain and organize their strength so as to have it available for the purposes of an effective Whenever it may occur."

Mr. Florence McCarthy of Skibbereen seconded the resolution in an eloquent speech, and it was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Laurence Waldron was called to the chair, and Mr. A. M. Sullivan, of Kilmallock, moved, and Mr. A. M. Sullivan seconded in eloquent and impressive terms, a vote of thanks to Mr. Butt, which acknowledgment of the compliment brought the proceedings to a close.

THE PERSECUTION IN GERMANY.

"The day is coming," said a Berlin newspaper the other day, "when Germany will be obliged to take up a hostile attitude towards those States which refuse to adopt her policy in religious matters." Already the rulers of Saxe-Gotha and Italy are the hostile states of M. de Bismarck, and the German press hints that those of Austria will do well to accept the same position. The Protestant Correspondence of Berlin openly warns the Protestants, whose remonstrances against the reign of brute-force inaugurated by the Prussian Chancellor become every day more energetic, that the Evangelical Church stands in the way of the "progress" which is the cause of consequences." Prussian Cæsarism makes no distinction between Catholics and Protestants when its own interests are concerned. And in this form of Absolutism our Paglia journals, which need to profess unity of feeling attachment to liberty of conscience, see nothing to condemn. Some of them even suggest that it would be well to introduce it in our own country.

SYMPTOMS OF ITS OVERTHROW.

Germany in many quarters is only of faith and courage all the lovers of Christian liberty. The brutal massacres of Bismarck are despised by men who know that God is on their side, and that He will confound the schemes of impiety. The revolutionary decrees of Berlin the noble Archbishop of Posen only replies by proclaiming the sacredness of the Catholic religion, and upon all lay teachers who shall accept, in violation of their functions and duties, the functions from which the clergy have been violently deposed. And as in Switzerland the Old Catholic subsidies go to Forney in order their respects to Mgr. Mermillod, banished by the unjust ruling of a Democratic Republic, so in Germany the same class openly avow their admiration of the apostolic courage of the Catholic prelates, and their disgust at the ignoble tyranny which vainly assumes the silence them. A Protestant writer, whose language we do not endorse, and who does not hesitate to call the new Catholic movement "a purging of the Church," declares in a book quoted by the Paris Journal that "we have to put back the nineteenth century into the darkest of the middle ages, to which he appears himself to belong." Catholics will be content to oppose this crowned persecutor, not with hard words, but with the more effective weapons of faith and prayer, and to appeal from him to a still more just tribunal than that of Germany, to the tribunal of history. Bismarck has already confessed that they do not exist in Geneva—prepare to dispense with their aid. The Italian journal, Per Voie Rhetier, avows it in these terms: "As in the Grisons was not expect nothing from the Catholics, and the 'Old Catholics' are too few in number to be of any service, the liberal Protestants must take the matter into their own hands, and give the finishing stroke to Ultramontanism." There is no doubt they would do it if they could; but as neither their cunning nor their ferocity have any other effect upon Catholics than to fortify the strong, confirm the weak, and unite all in the display of those supernatural virtues which are the proper fruit of the true faith, and distinguish it eternally from all counterfeits, when they have exhausted all their efforts it will only be rather stronger than it was before. For eighteen centuries all the powers of evil have combined to crush, by fraud or violence, what this Swiss Journal calls "Ultramontanism," and they have not had much success. Until the end of time the same combat will continue, and always with the same result. Never were the undying static characteristics of the combatants more clearly marked than at this day. On the one side we see patience and fortitude, virtue without hypocrisy, and courage without affectation; on the other, feeble violence, senseless calumny, and malignant injustice. The world might have learned by this time that such weapons are not strong enough to vanquish the Church, nor to pierce the strong shield of faith which, as she has proved a thousand times, overcometh the world."—London Tablet.

Proselytising Slanderers.

A Dr. Macaulay, who is, if we mistake not, a Scotchman, and editor of the Leisure Hour, has recently visited Ireland last year as the field of his summer expedition, in search of profitable "copy," has succeeded in producing a volume in which he gives English readers the benefit of his brief experience. The book will hardly dispel the clouds with which other writers of similar proclivities in Dr. Stanley have succeeded in obscuring simple matters of fact, as the following lines, which appear in it, will show:

"In the West of Ireland, even in wild Connemara, where there was hardly a Protestant only twenty years ago, there have been in churches filled with earnest worshipers. In remote stations I found flourishing churches and schools—in one place the minister and schoolmaster, formerly papists, but now the leaders of an earnest, band of Protestants. It is by the increase of good work like that of the Irish Church Missions that the true progress of Ireland will be secured."

In a review of Dr. Macaulay's book, the Irish Times, a Protestant paper, gives the following fair contradiction to this statement:

"Conemara is not so very wild but that it can be reached either from Galway or from Westport by a Bianconi's car. Thousands of tourists from all parts of the world find their way there to the inlet, some of them year after year, to enjoy its sublime scenery, its delicious and inspiring air, and the sport afforded by its trout and salmon streams. A good many of these people are Protestants, and go to the nearest church on Sundays. They have never been able to discover those batches of converts whom the Rev. Macaulay has spent years in Ireland. After a very wet summer, when the number of tourists must be at a low ebb, the Protestants are to be had, a few parents in each locality, in pity for their starving offspring, may send them to the Protestant school, and, perhaps, for the first glebin of prosperity recalls them to the Church of their early faith; and the only spiritual effect that has been produced is to impair in the minds both of parents and children their sense of duty, their reverence for conscience, and the ability to look their fellows straight in the face. Ninety-nine hundredths of the Protestants of Ireland know this to be a fact, and disapprove of every thing which works this mere injury and wrong."

Modern Ceremonies.

The substitutes which modern enlightenment adopts for the ancient guilds and confraternities of the Christian Church are neither imposing in themselves, even in their artistic aspect, nor conducive to the future of society. We have seen "Oddfellows" making a holiday, and we once witnessed a procession of "Odd Fellows," whose general appearance was such as to have been unexceptionable, as far as they went, but whose principles and spirit we deemed supposed to be defective, and their gambols not clearly distinguishable, by the light of a tax taper, from those of a troop of monkeys or a band of buffaloes. In such associations which are the genius of Protestantism, the human animal is not impressive, and when he tries to invest them with a more solemn character the result is still more distressing. Such an attempt was made at Wills' Rooms on the evening of the 7th instant, and was an imitation of the manners of our progressive friends, and its entertainments, as well as all former epochs, it deserves notice. As the principal actor in the dreary farce was one of the Irish Saxon Protestant clergy, and as he deep interest, we prefer to express our estimate of his performance in words used by the Saturday Review. on the occasion in question, "the Prince of Wales was genuinely excited at the Most Eminent Grand Master of the Order of Knights Templars." What such people did some centuries ago we all know, and what they committed faults, as they often did, we need not say; but we certainly require deeds which the poet still sings and the historian does not blush to record.

Protestant Knights Templars are of quite another sort, and though the Daily Telegraph narrates that Amiens with acting, and the Daily News with respect, the Saturday Review sees in them only "the mummeries of a country club," and simply "amused that any men of education and intelligence could be found to take part in such an idiotic performance." "That grown men," says the latter, "should have their chins, should wear the regalia of knighthood and glorify their ton-foolery, is really about as astonishing as anything that could well happen." The farce was all the more ghastly, because they had "a real clergyman to read prayers for them." The final comment of our contemporary is very grave, for he observes that the most grotesque clowns who frequent the Crystal Palace, and dance on the sward, ought now to feel that noblemen and gentlemen whose capacities of taking delight in the tawpenny tinsel and puerile pageant of the Knights Templars cannot be so very different from themselves." Yet there are probably not two of the actors in this ignoble scene who do not cherish a lofty disdain for the sacred institutions and solemn ceremonies of the Catholic Church. We see what they cannot consider serious substitutes for them. It is consoling to reflect that such things were not possible when England was Catholic, and that her children were and that they will ceasesto be possible if she should ever become Catholic again.—London Tablet, April 19.

Mr. Samuels, the Postmaster-General of New South Wales, has been sent to Washington to arrange with the United States Government for the transportation of the Pacific mails, by the steamship line that will run between San Francisco and Sidney, probably touching at Melbourne and other Australian ports.

THE STIGMATA.

The interest evinced by the public in the case of Miss COLLINS is manifestly not on the decline. So far from that, indeed, every paragraph having reference to it which is published in any of the daily papers, is eagerly read to the end. Discussion, too, on the nature and bearing of the alleged phenomena is frequent and active. Such being the case, it is regretable that the information supplied by the journals should be in so many instances defective and incorrect to a degree likely to lead to a great deal of misapprehension. Perhaps this was unavoidable. The persons most closely concerned—the young lady herself, her friends and her spiritual advisers—so far from courting any publicity, did their utmost to keep the fact of the appearance of the remarkable wounds a strict secret. It was only when the indiscreet utterances of certain parties bruited the matter abroad, so that it came to the ears of newspaper reporters, that the public prints contained anything about it.

Then the pestiferous tribe of professional "interviewers" swarmed around the residence of Miss COLLINS, or of those who were supposed to know anything concerning the reported stigmata. The little intelligence they got was, of course, dressed up into the requisites of the journals to which the interviewers were respectively attached. As a general rule, "sensation" was preferred to correctness, and consequently facts were distorted in order to attain the desired result. The mischief wrought has been great, inasmuch as an impression has been left on the minds of many that the authorities of the Church wanted to make a miracle out of the affair. What proper good that could effect is entirely beyond our comprehension. Those who already belong to the Catholic Church need no miracles to strengthen their attachment; and those who are outside her pale would require a far more astounding wonder than the appearance of the sign of the nails on the hands and feet of a young lady to shake them in their unbelief. All that the ecclesiastical authorities wanted at any time was to ascertain the facts of the case, noting very little whether the public chose to regard them as miraculous or not. These facts, so far as they have been ascertained, we now propose to give our readers without note or comment.

Some weeks before Easter, Miss COLLINS, who was previously in the enjoyment of excellent health, was suddenly attacked with a violent pain in the head. Her sufferings were intense, and she felt, as she described herself, as though a number of sharp points were being driven into her brow and around her head. The pain continued all day and through the night, but as no importance was attached to it, nothing was said about it. On that day week, however, the same symptoms occurred, but with longer duration and, if that were possible, with greater intensity. On the third occasion her torture was so severe as to reduce her to a state bordering on insensibility, and while she was in this condition she was additionally afflicted with pains in her hands and feet, but no wounds or marks of wounds were visible. It was actually distressing to those around Miss COLLINS to be compelled to witness her agony, without having it in their power to relieve it. The fourth time the young lady suffered was on the Feast of the Seven Dolors of the Blessed Virgin (April 4th), and then the wounds appeared on the upper part of her hands and feet, and blood issued from them.

On Good Friday her sufferings reached a climax apparently, and it was thought impossible, humanly speaking, that she could endure them. Indeed, it was the opinion of all who saw her at the time that her last hour had arrived. It was on this occasion that the wounds on the back of the hand looked as if they had penetrated through, for corresponding marks appeared on the palms. That day week, when Dr. MOORE saw her for a short time, and made a cursory examination of her hands, she suffered, comparatively, little or nothing. On the 25th of April, also, her condition was not very distressing. Next Friday, however, her pains regained their old intensity, and her writhings, as she lay prostrate, smote the hearts of the beholders with the most acute feelings of compassion. Since then precisely the same phenomena have been observed with unfailing regularity.

The order in which they occur has always been the same. Sometime during the afternoon of Thursday Miss COLLINS experiences the excruciating pains in the head to which we have alluded. This continues, with little abatement or intermission, all night, and on Friday partial insensibility, or, at least, indifference to all her surroundings, intervenes. The crisis of her sufferings appears to be reached when the wounds on her hands and feet open and bleed more or less copiously. The wounds do not, however, show simultaneously. One hand generally suffers first, then the other; and, judging from her motions and the uneasy movements of her frame, the wound in her side opens last. Sometimes it is absolutely appalling to witness her agony. Her limbs become rigid; she stretches out her arms in the form of a cross, whilst her countenance shows unmistakable signs of the torture to which she is put. But when the crisis is passed her face, on the contrary, wears an expression of ineffable sweetness and composure, so that she appears to be in a state of ecstatic contemplation.

We have said that, as a general rule, Miss COLLINS' singular ordeal commences on Thursday evening, but, to the astonishment of her friends, she exhibited the premonitory signs on the evening of Wednesday, 7th instant. She suffered all that night, all Thursday and all Friday, and on the last day it was found that the wounds in her feet, which previously appeared on the upper surface only, were visible also on the soles.

We have now enumerated the facts of the case, related to us by the very best authority, as they occurred and are occurring, and we shall say no more. It is not our province to pronounce as to the cause of those extraordinary phenomena, and we shall certainly not be presumptuous as to do so. We will merely state that Dr. PAWLICKI, the young lady's medical attendant, has given the case his earnest attention, and has carefully noted all the developments. He will in due time publish the result of his observations, and the verdict of a gentleman of his high scientific attainments cannot fail to have great weight with all intelligent readers

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D. M.R.I.A.

"Then, silence and hear your orders. The barbican cannot hold out ten minutes longer." The lamentations of the women were here renewed, but soon checked by the severe tone of command in which the knight now spoke. "The English will execute all male prisoners; such of you, therefore, as are able to bear arms must sally; but as the enemy are in force on the other side of the fosse, your wives and children must be left behind. Silence, women, or you must be removed; they will be safe from violence; there is no alternative; better to escape thus than to die before their faces, after provoking further illtreatment by selling your blood at a cost that can but exasperate the church who lose it. Hear your commands, then, Barry Oge, take six men and be ready to lower the drawbridge the moment the outer gate is thrown open. Son of Connogher, to you I commit the leading of the sally; you will throw open the outer gate when I give the word, and sally with your own and Redmond's company; Gillaspie, you will join the son of Manus when he has performed his orders, and with him bring up the rear."

And so he proceeded to issue his commands, with a peremptory rapidity that left no time for dispute or interruption, marching the men into the open space between the outer and inner gates from the galleries above, where the women and children were compelled to remain, after a brief space allowed for parting; and a sad scene their parting was, where the words of fondness that the husband pronounced over his wife were scarce audible in the din of blows redoubled on the yielding gates that must admit the enemies who were thirsting for his blood. But the pitiable scene was over, and men stood ready for the sally, the son of Connogher, battle axe in hand, at their head.

"Are you ready?" cried Talbot; the lieutenant was struggling with some strong emotion.

"One minute, Sir John!" he said, and, catching his sword from the eyes of the knight, laid down his battle axe, and ran back to the gallery. Art's courage was too well known to admit a suspicion of blenching on the mind of any man there, and it was thought that he desired to bring away some valuables, an opinion which procured him but little commendation from the impatient; and by no means clear-headed band he had left behind. He returned with little Fear-gus in his arms, folding the infant in a mantle as he descended. There were some who could not forbear a smile as they beheld him, but the greater number sympathized in the solicitude of the father.

"Here, Redmond," said Art, "help me to fix him on my back. I could so soon have the heart out of my breast behind me! Fergus, a leanaa," he said, looking round as the boy was belted firmly between his broad shoulders; "is the first time I ever had such reason to be both nasbow and back to an Englishman; and, darling, if your father has to show it for the first time this night, may the great God put a shield over you, that will take their blows as freely for your sake as this breast that I never never prses you to again! Noble, Sir John, I am ready now."

Talbot wrung his hand.—"May God speed and protect you!" he said; but the son of Connogher exclaimed in sudden amazement, "Staff of St. Patrick, Sir John! do you call him such an unmeaning?"

"No," said the knight, mournfully but firmly, "I must not leave my wife."

"Chorp an Chriost, Sir John, and why should we leave ours?"

"Were they in the same danger, Art, I should ask no man of your company to cross the drawbridge to-night; do you remember from what you have already saved her?"

"Dar mamon, Sir John, the warden can do you no harm now."

"I would to God he were past harming any of us more; but, Art, he has the will still, and I fear me much the will is all he has the power also; but the gate will be driven in before you go, if you fancy you have more of Manus, let go the chains; draw the main bolt, gillaspie; there, throw it open wide; now, no bogs, forward! strike together, and hold right ahead, and may God speed you!" The last words were drowned in a shout, with which the Irish rushed out into the darkness, and in another half minute the noise of strife from beyond the drawbridge announced that they were among the enemy. Talbot stood listening till the rush of the sallying column subsided from beyond the spot where they had met the assailants, and then, satisfied of their having pushed their way with unexpected success so far, he turned to the inner gate, now fast guarding to the safe side of those within the court-yard, and, withdrawing the bolts, stood with nothing in the hand but a lamp, alone before the victors.

"Sir John Talbot, you are my prisoner," said an officer, advancing the moment he saw him.

"I yield myself willingly to so brave a soldier, Sir William Brereton," replied the knight, "and I would claim gentle usage for the women and children, who are the only persons left here."

"That will be done no violence," replied the Englishman; "but your fear, Sir John, I must keep in strict custody, as well as yourself, until my Lord Deputy arrives."

"I then God, that I have to deal with a man of gentle manners at last," said the knight, "and will not repine at whatever custody you place me in, if we be put together."

"I have no orders to separate you, Sir John, and will be satisfied by your keeping your apartment."

"By my honor, I thank you!" cried Talbot, involuntarily extending his hand, but Brereton drew back. "Pardon me," said knight, quickly; "I had forgotten; I am a prisoner."

"If mine were the only hands in which you are wrapped, Sir John Talbot," replied the Englishman, "I should not let such a difference of condition stand between me and the hand of a man who did such good service to my mother's brother, but—"

"But what, sir?" I understand you not."

"I am a Christian," replied the Englishman.

"Death and perdition!" exclaimed the knight, "this accursed curse to be flung in my teeth at every turn! I wish Archbishop Alan and his murderers were with the devil together! I am sick of the hateful lie! but again, I pray you, Sir William, pardon me, for I have no right to tax you with injustice in believing what the world believes of me, although here steadfastly I appeal to God and man to witness, as shall yet be seen either on earth or in heaven, if there be virtue in truth, or justice in the ends of providence; but come, I am wearying you; lead me to my place of custody."

While the conference was going on, the barbican was taken possession of by the troops from the court-yard, as well as by ineffectual attempts to stay the flight of the flame exciting from the solid after their company that had escaped. Talbot was conducted to his apartment, at the door of which a sentry was posted, and where he was permitted to remain with his wife, undisturbed, save by their own apprehensions, till after sunrise.

Daylight disclosed an altered scene to those eyes, as they sat at the great window over the inner gate, looking down on the court-yard. Instead of sanding gallantries, in his wild costume, shouting and singing round the doorways, there stood the well-ordered men-at-arms, drawn up in two files from the keep to the gateway, silently awaiting the arrival of the victorious Lord Deputy. The red rose of England blew out broad and steady in the morning breeze from the flag staff that bristled borne the banner of Fitzgerald at sunset, and those cannon which but a few hours before had cast death and confusion among the English trenches, were now turned inwards on the walls they had defended, and pointed at the miserable remnant of the garrison where they stood, crowded into a narrow corner of the court, dismayed, dismayed, and helpless, expecting the doom of rebels.

As the dawn grew clearer, the knight could mark the faces of many whom he knew, among his unhappy fellow captives; there was Tyrrell, weak from loss of blood, sitting on the pavement with his back to the wall; Ulf Madden was there with one arm broken, hanging loose and unconscious from the shattered shoulder; and there was Sherlan, alone, afar off in his enmity, he could not but pity, as he stood with his hands tied behind his back, and his head sunk on his breast, while the blood that yet oozed from a wound on his forehead, down his bruised cheek to the ground. Many others there were whose sad plight he could not but commiserate, since there were none but those already named who he had seen known him ill will or violence—for the only man whom he would not have spilled was nowhere to be seen.

At length the noise of drums and trumpets announced the Lord Deputy's approach, and all eyes were turned to the gateway, as the mounted cavalcade came trampling over the drawbridge, and poured into the castle with the combined pomp of military, judicial, and ecclesiastical power; for there rode with the Lord Deputy the Chief Justice, the Chief Baron, and the Lord High Chancellor Archbishop Cromer, with many other exalted personages of high authority in the State. But there was another personage which suddenly attracted more than a divided interest with the entry of Sir William Skellington. As the Lord Deputy came in at the gates, there to mount from the keep a company of cuirassiers to receive him in the court yard; there was followed by Sir William Brereton with the keys; after him came Salisbury and Holland, two English captains, leading Fitzgerald's horse, his eyes were turned. He was neither manacled nor disarmed, and he advanced with an air of colorless loss confidence, although supported by such a yell of execration as might have deafened any but a Judas. It was plain he had sold the castle; but before the indignant knight or Irish could see what farther was to take place, they were summoned to attend the Lord Deputy.

"You have done the king good service, Sir William," were the first words they heard Skellington pronounce, as they were led forward among the throng, expecting, indeed, the worst that could befall, but bearing their fate with the descent resignation of long experience in misfortune; "you have done his Majesty good service, Sir William," said Sauflington; "let me know what farther lies in the power of his deputy."

"So please you, my lord, a thousand pounds to Master Parez in hand, and the disposal of two prisoners in his custody."

Talbot started, and Ellen's heart began to beat with fearful, indefinite apprehension.

"Are they rebels to the king," said the Lord Deputy.

"So please you, my lord," replied Brereton; "I will read your lordship his letter of stipulation, which will more explain all."

"Proceed, Sir William," said the knight took forth a paper, which he read as follows:

"After the honorable hands of Sir William Brereton, knight, these, with speed.

"Right Honorable—if you would devise a means to do good to a man, you would not waste your shot on my walls, but bear consider what proposes to your discretion, I am able to hold this castle, if I would, till Christmas. I am able to give the same into your hands, if I will, for a sturdiness to-morrow. Ponder the difference, and weigh the advantage. It is not that I need a reward, and yet a thousand pounds were far short of the value of the service; but I have reasons which concern myself and no sufficient. Wherefore, taking all thought of what may move me, take heed of what I am moved to. I will engage you this castle if you will secure me a thousand pounds and the custody of my own prisoners. These are no secrets which I must be left to deal with as I please, by and his pardon. In the name and by the order you shall have the castle, and I must have the full custody and disposal of my prisoners; that and the thousand pounds, so (right honorable), if you think fit to entertain this offer, send me a reply, and about it in to-morrow, as I be made able to you. Direct it to my own hands. I shall devise a means to have a care whether in readiness as shall pass for it, should it be seen by any of my garrison. And now, as you shall deal with me or not, I offer you my commendations or defiance; for, be either, my trust is equal to either course you take. Farewell.

PAREZ, Warden of Maynooth.

"Postscriptum.—Marshal, the difficulty and disposal of my prisoners. C. P."

It was with difficulty the Irish could be restrained from violence, even when escorted and guarded as they were, during the reading of this letter; and Parez, although he stood protected by an armed band, could not but shook under the terrible curses heaped upon him by his victims. But order was again restored by dint of blows, and the betrayer stood once more collected in audacious effrontery as Brereton, William's letter, and, pausing for a moment, looked round with a smile of triumph so diabolical, that a murmur of indignation burst involuntarily from even the gravest of the servants, and made the Irish prisoners and the lower sort showered forth curses on his head, both loud and terrible. Parez bore all with the same effrontery. But the tumult ceased all at once, for the face of the Lord Deputy, as he turned to address the warden again, was suddenly and fearfully changed.

"You are satisfied?" he said, more inquiring in a stern voice.

"I am, my lord," replied Parez, but in a tone of decreasing confidence.

"Provost Marshal," cried Skellington. "The officer advanced; the deputy pointed to Parez, and, speaking so loud as to be heard to the remotest quarter of the court-yard, cried, "Chop me off this man's head!"

"My lord!" exclaimed Parez, starting back, in half-incredulous dismay. "Your lordship, surely, cannot mean me!"

"Chop me off his head, I say!" cried Skellington again, in a still louder voice. "He has got more than he bargained for; he shall never betray a brother's trust again!"

"My lord, my lord," cried Parez, "you cannot mean to take my life so!"

"William, it is false!" exclaimed the Deputy. "I am bound to give you a thousand pounds—look to your money, man; you have the full sum you asked. I am bound to give you the disposal of your prisoners—have you voluntarily made one over to me, and I have, at your desire, appointed you to the wardship of the other; but, traitor, I shall know a light from the middle window of the west side of the keep nearest the battlement. The capture of a gun from your trenches offers a fit occasion for rejoicing; and I shall so order it that there will be no lack of powder to carry the garrison's revelries to a fortunate issue. I have drugged a cask of wine for the occasion, and if I be not deceived, some of our light hearts shall have heads heavy enough before morning. Remember the conditions of our agreement, and till I meet you at the door of the keep, farewell. Your honor's assured servant,

"Butlerspikes.—My prisoners lodge in the barbican; they are, one Talbot, erewhile a knight, but now under the ban of the Church, and a Mistress Ellen Dudley, his paramour.

"C. P."

"My lord," continued Brereton, "the signal being given, as here described, about two hours before day, we entered the place as directed, and found the garrison asleep; so that little labor sufficed to compass the warder's prisoners, however, are secured, and now await your lordship's pleasure."

"I cannot break the faith which you have pledged, Sir William," said Skellington. "This Talbot is convicted of the murder of an archbishop, and it matters little into whose hands he may fall, since, as I gather from Master Parez's letter, the warden meditates him as little good as the Chief Justice."

"My lord," said Parez, stepping forward, "I am willing to bend him over to the civil power, to be dealt with as the law has provided. I only stipulated to have the disposal of him, that no great a criminal should not escape by exchanging of prisoners or otherwise."

"Then why not execute him out of hand, while you had him here?" asked the Deputy.

"My lord," replied Parez, hesitating, "I—I was unwilling to stretch my authority, which, after all, is but limited in my lord's deputy's disposal over the land already—"

"Well, Master Parez, we shall settle this presently," said Skellington. "In the meantime, consider yourself the prisoner of the King's law, and remember that your power

CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

The Rev. Father Fransioli of St. Peter's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., sailed for Europe on Saturday, May 3d.

Many of the nuns and monks driven from their convents by the Italian Government are absolutely on the verge of starvation.

A monument is to be erected to the celebrated Augustinian Friar, Parvino Onofrio at Verona. Onofrio was a learned historical writer.

Died, April 17, at the Hotel Dieu, New Orleans, Sister Vincent (in the world, Miss Eugenie Landry), of the Order of Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul.

The Rev. Father Ballerina, S. J., editor of the Civilta Cattolica, has been arrested at Florence and sent to Milan. Report says that this arrest was made at the instigation of Prince Bismarck.

Rev. Father Guetry has been appointed Superior of the Sisters of Charity in the United States, to succeed the late Francis Burlando. He will reside permanently in Emmitsburg, Frederick county, Md.

The Feast of St. Gregory VII. and the eight hundredth anniversary of his ascending the Papal throne, occurring on the 25th of May, will be worthily celebrated in Bologna, Turin, and other Italian cities.

Rev. Father Villiger, S. J., has purchased a lot at the south western extremity of the present church lot on Seventeenth and Stiles streets, Philadelphia, for the erection of a new three story building, 60 by 126 feet.

The Comtesse Spaur, wife of the Bavarian Embassador to the Holy See during the troubles of 1848, has recently died. Upon the murder of Count Rossi, this lady generously aided the Holy Father to escape from Rome to Gaeta.

The clergy of Bohemia have endeavored to found a Catholic bank at Prague, entitled the "Bank of St. John," the management of which was to be exclusively in the hands of priests. The imperial authorities have, however, declined their assent to the scheme.

Father Gallerani, S. J., has been preaching in the Church of San Giacomo, Naples, on the primacy of Peter. His sermons so moved the congregation that bracelets, earrings and all sorts of jewelry were offered as voluntary contributions, besides over one thousand francs in Peter's pence.

Very Rev. James Rolando of St. Vincent's Church, Germantown, Penn., has recently been appointed by the Superior-General of the Lazarists, in Paris, to fill the position of Visitor of the Order in the United States, a position which has been vacant since the death of the late Very Rev. J. J. Hayden.

The French Journal Officiel says that the Japanese Government has abrogated the edicts against the Christians. Of the 3,000 Christians imprisoned under these edicts within the last four years, 1,200 have gone to receive the martyr's crown, and those that remain it is expected will be liberated.

The Voce della Verita announces with great regret the death of the eminent Catholic writer, Professor Nicola De Lecce, who died suddenly at Rome, March 27. He was a regular contributor to the journal above named, and had just written an article entitled, Le Persecuzioni Liberalesche in Ispagna, when he was smitten down by apoplexy.

A general meeting of the Catholic Community of Gibraltar was held in the Theatre Royal on 19th May. Mgr. Scandella, the Vicar Apostolic, presided, and the Lord Bishop of Calle was present. In relation to a grant by the Government for the building of the Church of the Sacred Heart, a vote of thanks was offered the Governament.

The new Patriarch of Jerusalem, Mgr. Vincenzo Bracco, was born at Torazza, near Biella, Genoa, on September 14, 1835. He was a scholar of the Propaganda institute, and entered Holy Orders in that city. His Holiness owing to the illness of Magilde, is in partibus, March 11, 1866. He is a profound Orientalist.

Detroit, Michigan, "The City of the Straits," has a Catholic history dating back to the days of the early French missionaries, who were religious as well as religion when the Indian savages were its undisputed masters. The first Catholic church erected was the old Ste. Anne, one of the relative walls are still standing, though its exterior steps have been worn down by the feet of successive generations.

The Catholics artist of Germany have made strong protest against the conduct of a painter of Karlsruhe, Hasch, who had prostituted his art to insult the Church by a pretended historical picture. They have sent to the number of 128, signed an address of sympathy and loyalty to the Pope among the signatories to which documents appear the distinguished names of Fuhrich, Deschwanden, Wörndle, Feul, Achenmann, Hess, Hess, Veit, Steinle, Madjera, Schöpf and Jobelin.

The Statistical Gazette of Geneva publishes the following: In 17 cantons of Switzerland there still remain 1,200 convents of men and 45 of women; total, 76. The number of monks is 546, and of nuns, 2,020. Of the monks, 422 are Fathers, 26 novices, and 91 lay brothers; 1,181 of the nuns are choir sisters, 185 lay sisters, and 85 novices. These 76 convents possess 22,645,815 francs worth of property. The famous convent of Einsiedlen, of Einsiedlen, contains 90 monks, and its possessions are worth more than 4,000,000 francs.

The religious reaction in Italy continues in a very remarkable manner. At Varoli, recently, a most imposing demonstration of faith took place. The city was formally consecrated to the Sacred Heart, and a tedeum ordered in reparation of the insults which have of late been offered our Saviour. On this occasion, the bishop gave the Holy Communion to more than two-thirds of the population, and when he pronounced the final benediction, the cathedral was far too small to contain the multitude, which filled even the great piazza in front.

A work recently published, "London Illustrated," by Dore, is a beautiful tribute to the Little Sisters of the Poor, says: "Charity so strange is exploited in the text. By strangers there is understood those that are not of your own kin, strangers to your blood." But the Little Sisters of the Poor interpret charity in a larger sense than this. The helpless, poor and aged are to them all neighbors; and within the measure of their means they gather them all into a comfortable fold. I have passed through the quiet calm, where the broken crusts of the poor were the banquets of the givers, and every living room of which is an ante-chamber of death. The Little Sisters, who have forsaken the pleasures of this world to wait as unpaid servants at the couch of destitution, as the Grace Darlings of a perpetual storm, heroines with hourly need for courage.

Faith and Free Thought.

Devotion and the ever-attractive "Stabat Mater" of Rossini drew an immense congregation to St. George's Cathedral on Palm Sunday evening, numbers among whom were evidently not Catholics. An excellent opportunity was thus afforded for some hard hits at the freethinking an unbelieving spirit of the present day—which the Very Rev. Dr. Doyle administered freely during his short but telling sermon. Keepers being concluded, he ascended the pulpit, and began by observing that the ceremonies of Holy Week were the most beautiful in the whole year, and among them none was more beautiful than the Office of Tenebræ. He had heard that office sung in different parts of the world, but never better than in that cathedral. In olden times Holy Week was celebrated with even more magnificence than at present; but that was a time when what is called "freethought"—a great word in our days—was not heard of. Now, he had no objection to a person being as much of a freethinker as he liked in matters connected solely with this world; but in things supernatural and spiritual there was no such thing as freethought. But what did freethought mean? It pretended that every individual, with regard to religion and Revelation, might think just as he liked. And this not so far only as this world is concerned, but even in regard to what will occur in eternity. The absurdity of this is evident. For where there is neither union nor certainty concerning things in the present existence, how can there be any certainly concerning what will occur after death? Yet some assert there is no existence for man hereafter. Is it, then, to be supposed that God made man to exist but for a short time on earth, and that when he died there should be an end of him? No. Faith—that faith to which conquers the world—assures him that after his remains have turned to ashes, he shall yet live eternally with his God.

THAT FAITH IS THE GIFT OF GOD.

He thanked God he had that faith. Yet man holds it in a fragile vessel, and may lose it the same as he would the vessel that true faith—believing not in many Gods, but in one, having not two Saviours, but one—has existed, unaltered, since the beginning of the world. The Jews held the true faith, so far as it had been revealed, until the coming of Christ, the Messiah, and prepared the world for His coming; Jesus founded the Catholic faith: which faith had continued till that night, and would till the end of time. God had left several wonders for the Jews—notably delivering them out of Egypt; and the recollection of that delivery was as fresh in their minds to-day as ever. And for that reason they were a people by which to confound any one who, withstanding all their faults, they were the people from which sprang Jesus and Mary, and one day they would be gathered into the fold of the faithful. And if the Jews had preserved strong evidence of the words of God preformed in their behalf, how much more so the Catholic Church, so replete with recollections of the wonderful mysteries and work of Redemption! The concealment of the body was in memory of the time when Jesus, the Messiah—who had come to fulfill the ancient prophecies and save our redemption—was crucified on Calvary, and was buried, and spreading their garments before Him, exclaimed:

"HOSANNA TO THE SON OF DAVID!"

Everywhere throughout the Catholic Church this day is a reference to these circumstances, is the fulfillment of the prophecy of Zacharias: "Shout, ye daughters of Zion: behold your King cometh unto thee, sitting upon an ass's colt;" and in memory of Christ was sung the sorrowful and forelelling her destruction. Such ceremonies she looked upon by freethinkers as superstitious. Three centuries ago they came with them in his country; and nowadays we are asked by the upholders of private judgment in spiritual matters, "Why can we not stay at home and read our Bibles, and do without all the ceremony?" Such persons read their Bibles, and have absorbed the refinements of the Church; but we may well inquire with what result to the country? Discord and dissolution. Look at the two great sections of Christians in this country. What a difference! The members of the Catholic faith, like soldiers, march on shoulder to shoulder, the right hand of God stretched over them; and as one generation passes and another comes, the one faith continues always the same. But what have freethinkers done? What do they do? Declare that the work of Redemption is a myth; another that it is doubtful whether there ever was a Christ at all; or, indeed, that there is a God at all. And for what? Simply to remove the fear of God, a terrible restraint, and to be left to moved from him who is blessed with the true faith of Christ, and keeps His commandments; and, which, were bodies have inundered into dust, we shall yet, through faith, live a new and eternal life. The preacher then earnestly prayed that the gift of faith might be given to all present, as well as the grace of perseverance.

The "Stabat Mater" was then sung, each portion of which was rendered very effectively. Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament concluded the service.

Pardon by the President.

A man named O'Brien, who was found guilty of murder in Washington City, D. C., was pardoned by President Grant, and thereupon the following editorial notice from the New York Nation went the rounds of the press.

The President has just pardoned a fool and bloody drunken assassin named O'Brien, in Washington, on the prayer of the Catholic clergy. We would warn the Protestant clergy that in the pardon insolence the priests will beat them utterly. Catholics commit a very considerable percentage of the national crimes, and if criminals are to be let off on account of their early piety or the piety of their relatives, we see no reason to predict that enough Catholic saints will turn up in the jails of our country to recall the days of Doellinger.

To this the Rev. Father John J. Keane, of Washington, makes the following reply, which is an address to the editor of the Catholic Review:

The assertion of the New York Nation that the President commuted O'Brien's sentence "on the prayer of the Catholic clergy," is a baseless falsehood. I have taken great pains to investigate, and am ascertained that not only was the commutation not granted on the prayer of the Catholic clergy," which I know well enough before any inquiry, but that no Catholic clergyman had anything to do with obtaining the commutation. If the New York Nation is anxious to ascertain how it was obtained, it may get all information from the Secretary of State, the Republic and Hon. H. F. Butler. You may make such use of this as you please, for contradicting the lie.

How many of the secular or Protestant press will make the correction? Not one.

MISCELLANEOUS IRISH NEWS.

Rev. Edward O'Dougherty, P. P. of Coleraine, died April 25th.

The Limerick Graving Dock was opened on the 14th instant. The Lord Lieutenant performed the inaugural ceremony.

This season salmon are more abundant at Athlone than they have been for a number of years.

At the Ballinasloen (county Carlow) fair, advance in the prices of sheep, pigs and cattle was realized.

Robert John Roche, Esq., Knockreigh, Adamstown, has been appointed to the commission of the peace for the county Wexford.

The foundation stone of the new Catholic Church, Glenarm, county Antrim, will soon be laid by the Most Rev. Dr. Dorrian.

Nicholas Kelly, John Russell, John Crogan and Patrick Foley were committed for trial at the Assizes at Kinsale for having taken part in the late riots in that city.

The Government has offered a reward of £100 for the detection of the author of the threatening letters recently sent to Judge Lawson of Belfast.

Mrs. Balfe, the wife of the eminent Dublin composer, lately deceased, has presented the original score of his operatic works to the Irish Museum.

During the month succeeding St. Patrick's day, more than one hundred young people left Sligo and the vicinity for America.

Very Rev. Father Burke, O. P., after his return from Rome, preached in Dublin on the 30th April—the Feast of St. Catherine of Sienna. Father Burke will conduct the Spiritual Retreat for the clergy of the Diocese of Tuam, commencing in the early part of the present month.

The people of Mayo complain that fish has been exceedingly scarce during last year. In the autumn of 1872 there has been favorable to farmers. Work for the epic ng months has nearly been completed. Turf is being dried, and it is hoped that a fair crop of last season that remained until now will supplement an abundant cutting during this year.

As another instance of the rapidly increasing value of land in the county of Tipperary, it is mentioned that a farmer living not quite seven miles from Nenagh, disposed of his interest in part of his farm, consisting of twelve Irish acres, held under a lease which has only three years to run, and subject to the payment of £1 an acre, for the enormous sum of £300.

Professor Denis Pontet died recently in Dublin. As a teacher of the French language Professor Pontet enjoyed, for nearly 20 years, a reputation second to none in the kingdom, and his name will long be remembe red as being one whose writings are calculated to facilitate works of their class in educational literature.

Upon the return from Dublin of Mr. J. Ormsby Dooks of Kilturra Abbey, county Sligo, his tenantry held a grand rally in his honor. Bonfires blazed on all the mountain tops in the district, and from the ruins of Kilturra, and along the route from Ballymote caddies were placed in the windows. The horses were taken from the carriage in which Mr. Dooks rode and it was drawn along by the enthusiastic tenantry. A song of welcome was sung by John Scully, an old man seventy-five years of age. It was composed by himself.

Mr. M'Mahon, M. P. for New Ross, recently presented a memorial to Mr. Gladstone, signed by a large number of Irish members, praying that a bill might be passed granting the Irish people the benefit of Parliamentary representation on the same footing as the people of England. Gladstone refused to promise to deal with the subject during this session of Parliament, and might have added that a similar answer would be returned to any similar request during future sessions.

On 5th April a man was run over by the mineral train from Dublin, on passing the bridge between Sandpit and Salthill, and reaching the last station. Across the railway the dead body of a man cut in two across the stomach, the entrails protruding. The cut was as clear as possibly could be effected by a train dashing along at full speed. There was no evidence of the body being dragged along or mangled, no trace of hacking, but a total separation, as if effected by a knife. The attempted agency was decided on the features, as through the last moments were of excruciating torture.

On the evening of the 22d ult., Mr. Sugre, butter merchant, was passing along Great George's Street, when a servant looking man pushed violently against him and struck him several heavy blows, pulling the latter out of his pocket. He succeeded in effecting his escape, but was immediately seized by Mr. Sugre, who, with a few gentlemen, who accompanied him, held him safely till a constable arrived. More excitement was caused by the affair, as the prisoner, under an outrage so gross as scarcely ever to have been attempted in that city. In San Francisco we should be surprised, if forty-eight hours passed without the happening of a similar occurrence or one a good deal worse.

TO-DAY AND TO-MORROW.

To-day, man lives in pleasure, wealth and pride;
Yesterday, he was a child, and knew not why;
To-day, he's pleas'd at many years to come;
To-morrow, he's not born, and cannot die.
To-day, he's a man, and thinks himself so;
To-morrow, he himself is feast for worms;
To-day, he's learned, and knows the world;
To-morrow, shrouded for a bed of clay.
To-day, enjoys delights, both in the mind;
To-morrow, his coffin is purchased.
To-day, he's gathering of the honey wave;
To-morrow, leaves his lines for a grave.
To-day, he's mounted on the wings of fame;
To-morrow, buffeteer in the night of all.
Thus, man, thy life is but a span.

THE CHURCH AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

From a sermon delivered in St. Patrick's Church, Spokane, N. S. W., Australia, on Sunday, March 9th, by the Rev. Father Patrick F. Dillon, pastor of Camden, we take the following complete exposure of the designs of Freemasonry against the Church of God and the good order of the world:

The secularists would seem, in fact, to use the Bible exactly after the fashion of Masonry. The Bible is the great book of Masonry, provide the Bible with the compass and square, and you have the whole mystery. They perish the lower grades to keep it, although, except so far as the name is concerned, they may as well have the Koran; but further on the ambitious Master is told, when sufficiently trained, that the Bible is all a sham and means the Universe whose God, if Gods there be, is the sun, and that the four religions of Freemasonry, hatred be Christ, for Popes, for Kings, and the setting of the shining civil order for the coming of what is called the "light." So it is with the secularists. The Bible is now rejected in the public schools, meaning as I have previously pointed out, that the Bible is

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

IRELAND.

An "Atlantic" Romance.

Yo who think the age of romance is past and gone, lend attention! Sauntering through those fonts, yesterday, you might have seen a young lady, fragile and delicate looking, but truly beautiful, leaning on the arm of a young gentleman whose eyes wandered infinitely enough among the prize-ticketed treasures of Mr. Baifa's collection, while his hand ear-beckoned for her every whisper. Not "those near," but "yon far," walked gravely, but with rather pleased and happy countenance, three or four ladies and gentleman of mature years, who, you would say, evidently had something akin to parental interest in the young people. That young man landed only the day before, on b a return from the wreck of the ill-fated Atlantic, on board which he took passage barely six weeks ago, overwhelmed with anguish and despair. He and that young and beautiful girl met at the Flower Show, this time five years ago, on the occasion of the Prince of Wales' visit, were introduced, and—the old story!—told as the hills, yet not oftener!—fell madly in love. Very madly; for her reiner (sh! the traditional "stern parent!") was savagely averse to such a proceeding. Young Mr. —— set off soon after to India; full of the idea of returning, like the hero in every romance, with rupees in store;" but he came back a few months ago with nothing of the sort. There was a meeting and a stormy scene in the drawing-room of a certain mansion not a thousand miles from Merrion square day last February, which ended in the young gentleman setting off for America in the splendid screw ship Atlantic." But that scene was nothing to the one that ensued on the steeling when the news arrived of the awful calamity off Halifax. For twenty hours the heart-crushed girl hung between life and death, with the first physicians of Dublin bending over her, or trying to pacify her distracted lady. The second day she drove like mad into town, full of an idea. He telegraphed to Halifax, and next day had a reply that young Mr. —— was among the saved, but shoeless and shirtless, housed by the police in Halifax! "Hope" made up his mind not to do things by halves: telegraphed to him to return forwith—which he did; and, before many days elapse, the hero and heroine of this dew eruption romance will terminate it as all happy stories are closed, amidst strange blossoms and bridegcake, and a shower of bonbons and old suppers.—Nation, April 26.

Blood Money.

The modest claim for compensation preferred under the Coercion Act, by the husband and sons of the late Mrs. Neill, the victim of the Rathgar murder, was investigated by the county Dublin Grand Jury on Monday. The "little bill" amounted to £9,000, and payment of it was advocated by a strong bar, of which the leader, Sergeant Armstrong, made a long statement with a view of showing that the murder of Mrs. Neill was one of an agrarian nature. Of course, the Rathgar case of murder, "which is being compelled to "pay the piper," and its legal representative at the inquiry cross-examined Mr. Neill with a view, apparently, of showing that he had gained rather than lost by the death of his wife. The Grand Jury resolved to give no compensation at all to Mrs. Neill's sons, and only half to the husband's claim to £500, and ordered this sum to be levied out of Rathmines, but offr b se, we think, are. Had Rathmines think this unusually considera Grand Jury would have done.—Nation, April 26.

Affairs in Kinsale.

It is satisfactory to be able to state, on the authority of the Cork Examiner, that in Kinsale things have completely resumed their old condition. The fishbuyers have all returned to their posts, and transact business just as they did before the late lamentable riot. The arrangements between them and the fishermen continue as of old, and no new difficulties are to be met with likely to arise. "The buyers," the Examiner says, "don't appear to be very well satisfied with the articles that have appeared in the London Times, and we understand it is their intention to denounce the assertions contained in them." This is a pretty commentary surely on the prediction of the British journal, that "coy capital" would desert Kinsale.—Nation, April 26.

ENGLAND.

"Civilized England."

One of the most striking illustrations of the tendency of the present age to "return to nature" is to be found in the change which has come over our national methods of fighting. It is curious to notice the almost entire disuse into which the cudgel or bludgeon, the favorite arm of our forefathers, has fallen, and the completeness to which its place has been supplied by the simpler weapons with which nature herself has provided us. This return to the ways of simplicity has been productive of the utmost important results, and nothing has not more completely reflected the spirit than has the general adoption of the practice of kicking charged the whole face of street and public-house fighting, to say nothing of that of the fighter. To such an extent has the taken place that we have come to look at the matter less from the point of view of the social philosopher than that of the criminal legislator have been impelled to take action on the subject. Mr. Ralph Darling, the Coroner for the borough of Wigan, has addressed a letter to the Home Secretary with reference to the recent kicking cases in his district, and especially to that of a man named Peter Dean, who died on the 21 April, in Wigan work-house from injuries caused by being wickedly kicked on the 23d of March last." The case was similar to one of which Mr. Darlington called the attention of the Home secretary last year, and at the inquest Mr. Darlington expressed a strong opinion, in which Mr. Darlington concurs, that "if flogging was made a part of the punishment in case of kicking it would have the effect of checking this brutal practice unfortunately prevalent in this district." The clogs worn by the working classes there have wooden soles with narrow iron, bound with iron and tipped with form most dangerous weapons, and are readily resorted to on the smallest provocation. "Within my district alone" (the borough of Wigan), Mr. Darlington adds, "four persons have been kicked to death during the last two years, and several cases of serious injury have come to my notice." An official reply from the Home Office informs the writer that the subject to which his letter relates "will be fully considered." No doubt the matter deserves full consideration, and though it would perhaps be too "rash and violent" a reform to attempt at once to put an end to the practice of kicking, something at least might be done in the way inducing the blackguards of Wigan to abandon their iron-bound boots, and adopt a lighter form of chaussure for those encounters. As a compromise the present form of boot might be reserved for the settlement of conjugal differences.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Interesting Case for Home Rulers.

A case of some interest to Home Rulers was tried on April 15th, before Sheriff Murray, in Glasgow. The facts briefly stated are these: Some time ago an application was made to admit James Lewis, of Calton, as a member of the Glasgow Home Rule Association. The application was refused by the council, and Mr. Lewis, considering it an imputation on his character, took action for damages against Mr. Robert Mc Killop, the member of council who proposed his non admission. The summons and complaint charged Mr. McKillop with having maliciously stated to the council that pursuer was an informer and police spy, who had given private information to the authorities, which led to the conviction of Michael Barrett who was hanged some years ago for the Clerkenwell affair. Mr. Lewis concluded his own case. Mr. Mc-Killop was defended by Mr. Murdoch. The case having been stated, pursuer produced a copy of the Sing of Ireland, containing a letter from an American correspondent, in which allusion was made to Ellegion informer. Pursuer admitted that he was the party referred to in the letter. Witnesses were then called, including several members of council who were sum to prove that Mr. Lewis. Their evidence went to so show that defendant had not positively stated that pursuer was an informer, but that he was commonly reputed to be such, and that there was a very general belief among the Irish people of Glasgow that pursuer had given private information to the authorities in the case of Michael Barrett. Witnesses were then called, including several members of council who were sum to prove that Mr. Lewis. Their evidence went to so show that defendant had not positively stated that pursuer was an informer, but that he was commonly reputed to be such, and that there was a very general belief among the Irish people of Glasgow that pursuer had given private information to the authorities in the case of Michael Barrett. Mr. Murdoch submitted that the complaint was not proved, and that the statements made by defendant in the council as a privileged communication.

His Lordship sustained the defense and dismissed the case, considering it proved that there was a report of the kind stated by defendant, and finding that the Home Rule Association had a perfect right to protect its own interests, and that defendant was quite entitled to propose the motion he made in council.—Scotsman.

Selling Souls.

When slavery prevailed in the United States a practice was laid at sorts of Protestant and Dissenting moral writers doing their best to show up the abomination of putting the bodies of human beings up to public auction, seemingly quite oblivious of the fact that in Protestant England the sale of souls of white human beings was and is such a common practice that it is looked on as an ordinary business transaction. If there ever was an execrable abomination, insulting and outrageous both to God and man, it is the system of the sale of livings which is allowed to be so commonly practiced in the Established Church of England. Within the last six months four of the parish churches of Liverpool have been offered for sale. What a satisfaction to think that in most of these transactions was the sale by auction of the cure of souls," which the parish church of St. Philip, Liverpool, is supposed to accomplish. In this case the purchaser is again a clergyman. The reverend dispenser of the souls of this portion of the good people of Liverpool is the Rev. Wood man, who hails from Putney. What is to be made out of the souls of the congregation of St. Philip's has not transpired, but in most uncommon specimen of the reformed Christianity which Henry VIII. and his Philip's, Liverpool, of the value of £300 to £500, with prospect of an increase. The living is presented, and enjoys the privilege of marrying from all parts of the town." Could religion be more disrespected and degraded than this? Christendom may well weep over such a spectacle as this.—London Universe.

FRANCE.

Christina Burial.

The Messager du Midi contains an account of those attempts, so often made of late by the infidels, to procure the interment of the body of a deceased Catholic without the rites of the rites of religion. Happily in the instance before us their profanity was defeated. The family of the deceased had sought and of course obtained the services of the Catholic clergy. The latter, however, knowing from past experience the enemy with whom they had to deal, called in the aid of a guard of soldiers; so that when the libres pensees arrived at the cemetery, intending to possess themselves of the corpse, they found to their dismay that the full performance of the Catholic rites would be carried out in spite of them, under the protection of the military. A fine thing indeed would it then be not fear God, have a great fear of the gendarmerie, and so they kept themselves in order a most wholesome moral suffering the religious ceremony being ended, and the soldiers gone, the survivors and the living relatives, they could indulge their outraged feelings as to sure and in safety. Then did they surround the grave (which had been the cause bleat); and one of them, remarkable for his eloquence as for his intelligence, but no known beyond the limits of his parish, stepped out in piteous accents as he waved au revoir to the body of his friend. "Adieu, my friend! we have killed him a Christian, and not like a dog (a bitter pensaere did he mean?) in spite of the priests." The funeral oration, as far as it was comical, provoked a roar of laughter amongst the crowd, in the midst of which the discomfited infidels beat a hasty retreat, denouncing the Jesuits (who had nothing to do with it), and resolving each to secure a dog's funeral for himself. To-day—so we say, the sooner the better.—London Universe.

The German Occupation.

It was a fortunate accident, or purpose, that placed General Manteuffel at the head of the German troops left in France, pending the complete fulfillment of the articles of the treaty of peace. In his intercourse with the French he has labored gently and courteously, so as to mitigate the natural French feeling of irritation, and to make the occupation of their departments as inoffensive as possible. The result has been the growth of a very friendly feeling on both sides, which has greatly strengthened by the general relinquishing the birthright of M. Thiers by a decree of which the principal French functionaries at Nancy were invited, and at which the German Commander in Chief proposed in the French's health in very complimentary terms. Those little messenges of courtesy have a very salutary tendency.—Weekly Register.

The Wealth of France.

The recuperative power of France has been strikingly manifested by many circumstances during the past year and a half, but perhaps the statement recently made by the official journal of M. Thiers in reference to the increase in the public revenue, will convey the liveliest idea of the enormous resources of that country. The revenue from the direct taxes, we are told, during the first two months of the present year, exceeds, by seven millions francs, that of the corresponding period of last year, and the produce of the indirect taxes in the first three months has exceeded the estimate of the Minister of Finance by fifteen millions.

ITALY.

The Unity of the Episcopate.

Some weak and timid Catholics are alarmed by the possibility of an anti Pope if the election were to take place at the present crisis. To these we may reply that the conditions under which the schism of the West was possible in the middle ages no longer exist. At that epoch facts were slow of communication. Bishops in one State might be for years ignorant of what the Church was thinking and doing at its centre or in another country. It was easy for statesmen to distort and conceal facts; to murder a Legate and suppress his dispatches, and the ignorant and mere ordinary laymen could not be a judge on so intricate a situation as was then created.

The rapid and easy intercourse which now subsists between the Holy See and every part of Christendom, the magnificent unity of the episcopate, the very enmity of nearly every government to the Church are so many guarantees against any such possibility occurring. Moreover, no one seems to be feared from any future Pope. He can no more renounce the temporal power than any of his predecessors, and, as the second to Pius IX., but is part of his past final office, than he can change the fundamental tenets or the dogmas of the Church. The Non Possumus stands eternally written for the successor of Peter, and he will be himself, and wears a "liberal" cardinal (if such there be) to the test. The curse of the office would at once outweigh any timid Gallicanism. He could only succeed to the position of Pius IX. by a manifestation of the Sovereign of India than a the Khan of Tartary. He would have no temptation to grudge. We have been the great stumbling block in their way to the fulfilment of the will of God, and, if they do not repent, have a heavy loss in men, money and prestige to bear. They are deserving of a terrible upon revenge. Hence the extreme gauche at Berlin; hence the friendly intercourse with Washington; hence the Kulturkampf in addition. The Holy Father's Health

The Holy Father is completely recovered from his very severe indisposition. We have to hold up to the execration of all noble minded men the execration of all noble minded men the illness of the Sovereign Pontiff by the journals of the revolution. Their fiendish joy when the news was first flashed over the world, and their disgraceful expressions of regret when it was known that he was once more disappointed them. He will do more than that, we trust. But when we read in the Opinione that Dr. Constantini [who has been dead two years] has held a consultation upon the state of the Pontiff's health, and that Mgr. Nielly deceased three years ago] proposed the efforts of the who wished almost to compel the Pope to leave his bed, we begin to make a and something of the depth of the degradation to which the Victor Emmanuel party in the Peninsula has sunk. And to Rome new in the difficulties which had proved upon it since the last disastrous war gave opening to anti-papal intrigue, and the reaction would be only of a transitory nature, and that France would again rise in its place among the States of Europe as le grande nation, and once more hold the place it had the Minister of War. The progress of Russia has written in Pius XI. to express not only her sympathy with his late suffering, but openly to disavow all approval of the falsifications to which the Government of Piedmont has lately had recourse in reference to the Concordat. This same lady is fascinating chiefly on all sides, and with both hands, as they say, to the utter ruination of people whom Victor Emmanuel has left to starve. Let us wonder that the cry of the day, "Long live the Empress!" while at Sorrento and Naples the reception of Humbert and Margherita was nothing less than frozen.—London Universe, April 26.

Death of a Roman Prince.

From Rome is reported the death of Prince Massimo, the head of one of the oldest and noblest families in Rome, and a firm adherent and champion of the temporal power of the Pope. So ancient, indeed, was his pedigree that it is said he claimed descent from Q. Fabius Maximus, the "Cunctator" of the Punic wars—a claim which, if true, throws into the shade the Courtenays of England, of France and of the Emperor of Russia. He was a man of the age of sixty-nine, and he was cheered in his last moments by the Pontifical blessing. As a proof of his adherence to the old state of things, it is stated on good authority that from the time when King Victor Emmanuel's troops entered Rome he had kept the gates of his palace closed, and steadily refused admittance to any from the Holy City or to have anything to say to the new comers. His mother was Christina of Savoy, widow of the Prince of Carignan. He was twice married, and his eldest son married the daughter of the Duchesse de Berri, half-sister of Henry V., the Count de Chambord. He had in all three sons, the youngest of whom is in his novitiate with the Jesuits. With respect to the late prince, a contemporary says: "Piety, fidelity, and courage are as a heritage in the house of Massimo, and of him who has just been gathered to his fathers we may truly say: This was the noblest Roman of them all."

RUSSIA.

The Khivan Expedition

The intention of Russia with regard to the expedition against Khiva is now generally better understood, or we should perhaps rather say they are more plainly and unequivocally avowed; and as the Russian papers become more and more outspoken, our surprise and pain grows stronger and stronger. Hence the extreme gauche at Berlin; hence the friendly intercourse with Washington; hence the Kulturkampf in addition. It will be an expensive affair, and the end will be buried and hidden, but the end be accomplished. ## WORSE THAN UNFAIR.

In deciding any controversy it is well to hear both sides. That is the reason why we trust our readers to the following article from the Chronicle of last Saturday:

The Catholic Monitor, with its characteristic desire to misrepresent everything not in accordance with its own views, and in harmony with the organization whose servile organ it is, misrepresents the most shameful and unfair manner the proceedings of the Republican party in Spain. It garbles and falsifies the utterances of a distinguished writer, and slanders the character and motives of Castelar, Figueras, Pi y Margall and other eminent patriots who are endeavoring to build up a Republic in Spain. It is true the journal cannot sustain itself or Church exactly by misrepresentations so utterly devoid of truth as this, but it must needs be poor servants of the devil if we sometimes do not lie in his name and for his benefit. Thomas and Castelar are sons of pure and exalted purpose. They live and labor for the good of the Spanish people, for the freedom of conscience, and for the Spanish liberty, freedom and republic of America. Their success is the triumph of the holiest principles, the triumph of humanity. The man who would sneer at such men is in the state of a despicable thing that sits palsy with freedom of conscience or civil liberty on its mind.

Passing by the uncourteous and unwarrantable assertion contained in the first few lines as altogether beneath our notice, we wish to make some remarks upon the remaining portions of this creditable speckmen of journalistic literature. If, by styling us "the servile organ" of an "organization" not particularized, our contemporary only means to say that we strive our utmost, on all occasions, to give expression to Catholic sentiment, we have nothing to do but find fault with the phraseology in which the idea is conveyed. That happens to be purely a matter of taste and decency; so perhaps it would hardly profit us much to remonstrate with a "live journal" fond of creating sensations without caring greatly about their character. But if, as we think most likely, the Chronicle means to insinuate that THE MONITOR is controlled, or "inspired," as the French say, either directly or indirectly, in any shape or form whatsoever, by the Catholic clergy of this State or of any other place, then do we decidedly and emphatically pronounce the assertion to be totally devoid of foundation. The only proprietors of THE MONITOR are two gentlemen, both well known to the community; the paper has a responsible editor, and no clergyman belonging to the Catholic Church has written a line for our leading columns during through any lack of respect or veneration for the anointed ministers of our holy faith —God forbid!—but in order that the thorough independence of this journal may henceforward be neither questioned nor questionable.

It may be thought by some friends that we put rather too much warmth into this disclaimer; but we urge, in extenuation, that there is nothing more annoying, or insulting, indeed, to a Catholic journalist, than to find every opinion he gives utterance to, referred to, "priestly dictation," or "ecclesiastical influence," or something else equally shadowy. Writers on the secular journals cannot understand the unanimity of feeling with respect to all matters relating to faith or morals exhibited by our co-religionists over the world; and, unmoved by considerations of honor or justice, they have no hesitation in ascribing it to an unmanly subjection to the commands of a certain class. They seem to forget that when they write or speak they give expression to Protestant opinions, as men who have been reared in the Protestant faith and instructed by Protestant teachers. It ought to be free to us, then, to write and speak as Catholics, without being annoyed by reflections on our independence. As for the Catholic clergy in this country they meddle very little indeed in politics—certainly far less than the ministers of any other denomination. For this good reason they do not vote, and do not seek, any ownership over the press. They prefer bestowing attention upon their own affairs. Like men of all denominations, lay just as well as clerical, they support and encourage those newspapers the policy of which is agreeable to them. Yet, we venture to assert there is hardly any organization or body which cares less about influencing the press. They have not at all the exaggerated idea of the advantages and importance of that institution which is entertained so complacently by "able editors." For ourselves we shall merely state that we are quite as free from exterior influences as the Chronicle, we might lawfully and truthfully say, indeed, a great deal more so, if all we bear is to be dignified reply.

Now with reference to the Spanish Republican party. Our contemporary characterizes the extract from a Madrid paper, which we published last week, as "the inane ravings of some anonymous communicative writer." That is no way to deal with the matter. We might as well call the Chronicle's article above quoted the insane ravings of some anonymous infidel writer. It is not a reproach to the press that its writings are anonymous, for most sensible people think they should be so. We never attributed the extract to FIGUERAS, CASTELAR, PI Y MARGALL, or any other eminent patriots, and we duly our contemporary to point out where we did. It has no right, therefore, to charge us with doing that of which we have not ever dreamed. We may remark, en passant, that our contemporary shows its knowledge of the famous Spanish orator by misprinting his name every time it occurs in the article. To return. CASTELAR, FIGUERAS and men of their stamp mean well, and, we believe, abhor the ridiculous and irreligious excesses of Communism. We have yet seen nothing from either of them which would warrant us in charging them with being mere aimless dashers of society. But we maintain that the sentiments expressed in the quotation from the Madrid sheet are precisely those of the bulk of the men in Spain who call themselves Republicans. The "moderados," almost all belonging to the literary or professional classes, are comparatively few in number; and though they may be permitted to carry on the Government as long as the Carlist rising is threatening, yet they are sure to be set aside the moment the Republic is established on a sure basis. The Republicans, it judged by nineteen out of every twenty of their number, are a certain portion of the artisans and workingmen of the cities who have been corrupted by bad teachings, and who dream of enriching themselves by the plunder of their employers and superiors.

That we do not wrong them by speaking thus, our contemporary will, we hope, acknowledge after it has studied the significant fact that it is exactly where the so-called Republican element is strongest that these communistic proceedings are most to abound. So, undoubtedly, the continuance of the Spanish Republic means the accession to power of men who will play the same game as their contemporaries disgraced Paris in the early part of 1871. The great majority of the Spanish people do not know anything about Republicanism, and it is opposed to all their customs and traditions, and has gained ground only because it was fair to see. There are now and long have been the freest people in Europe, enjoying the largest amount of self-government, with the most perfect municipal organization and the most extended franchise. The disturbances which have agitated their country have been owing in great part to French and English interference, and partly to the restless character of the people themselves. There is no grounds for expecting that a Republican Government would effect any change for the better in their condition; but there is reason for fearing that it will reduce them to a state worse than that of the Mexicans. We suppose that the Chronicle will confess that a monarchy, even like that of FRANCE, would be preferable to a Republic such as we have on our Southern borders. Liberty, freedom of conscience, education of the masses, the emancipation of slaves—all that our contemporary regards as holy in principle, save, perhaps, the shutting up of churches, the seizure of property belonging to the religious bodies, and the abolition of that right of industry and intelligence to accumulate property—would be far better promoted by the former than by the latter.

It is not high time that enlightened American schoolchildren two very foolish that because Republicanism is the best for this country it must, necessarily, be the best for all others; the other, that whatever demagogues and visionaries preach up as Republicanism in Europe, must necessarily be as admirable and beneficial as the thing which we call by the same name. It is not far more in accordance with common sense to hold that there is no such thing as abstract perfection in government, and that that form is best which is most in harmony with the traditions and sympathies of a people, which preserves order, advances civilization and allows its subjects all rational and Christian liberty? That is our opinion, and we shall always maintain it. We shall not be led astray by a name falsely applied, so as to encourage or applaud revolutionists, whoever those, in their grandiloquence, to style themselves. Republicans or champions of the rights of man!

AN EASY EXPLANATION.

There are some very clever people to whom nothing whatever is a mystery. It is impossible to keep them in the dark or to practice any deception upon them. Their wonderful astuteness overcomes every obstacle and penetrates every nook and cranny wherein truth may be concealed. We might not been astonished at the ease and dexterity with which people of this class explains away the supernatural occurrences which marked the progress of Christianity among nations? Why should not all praise be given to the genius who simplified the passage of the Israelites in safety across the Red Sea and the destruction of Pharaon's hosts by asserting that the tide was out when the Jews crossed over, and it suddenly came in while the Egyptians were making their way over? If one will only take the reasoning of those people for granted, miracles disappear and the most astounding wonders are resolved into simple every-day events. Modern writers have been kind enough to treat the human intellect very tenderly, and to show the utmost regard for its weakness. They will not put too severe a strain upon it by asking it to believe anything surpassing its own comprehension. They minister to the vanity inherent in our poor nature by telling us repeatedly, and in strong language, that our mind is the supreme judge of truth and right in things visible and invisible, and anything that our mind cannot grasp is to be disregarded as worthless or unreliable.

This is the religion of the nineteenth century, the creed of atheneum philanthropists, humanitarianism, the deification of intellect, the submission of all things to its judgments. As some people put everything to Christianity and revere the doctrines taught by the Redeemer, these new lights undertake to simplify matters for them by divesting his faith of everything supernatural, and a principles of everything conflicting with pride and self-love. Hence, outside the Catholic Church, the one object of religious literature, so called, seems to be to "tone down" Christianity; to reduce it to a level below that of cultivated paganism;

Santa Barbara is to have a piening mill.

RAMBLES IN THE INTERIOR—No. 2.

Stockton

Is the only incorporated city in San Joaquin county. It contains about eleven thousand inhabitants, and has many handsome private residences, as well as substantial public buildings. The State Insane Asylum, or rather Asylums, for there is a male and female institution, are located here. These buildings are commodious, the grounds are tastefully laid out, and the internal management unexceptionable. There are about a thousand patients in the two institutions, in different stages of mental darkness, from the harmless chattering idiot to the raving maniac. A number of patients are yearly restored to their friends, entirely cured. The males are far in excess of the females; but the latter, we learned, are far more difficult of successful treatment.

Stockton is built on a slough of the San Joaquin river, and is ninety miles from San Francisco by rail and one hundred and forty by water. The site of the city is quite level; the streets are wide, and generally have rows of trees planted along the sidewalk, affording agreeable shade from the rays of the hot summer sun. The Catholic church is probably the finest sacred edifice in the State outside of San Francisco. An artesian well near the center of the city supplies nearly 250,000 gallons of water daily, which rises nine feet above the level of the street. It is the principal shipping port for the vast agricultural region of the San Joaquin valley. It is connected by rail with Copperopolis, Sacramento, Marysville, etc., and by rail and water with San Francisco. The large number of substantial stores being erected, as well as the air of bustle on the streets, indicated a high state of prosperity; yet the citizens generally complain of dull times, and say that money is not near as plentiful as before the advent of the railroad, and that it was the grand mart of the Southern mines. Certainly the railroad management has evinced no friendly feeling to Stockton, and has gone so far as to attempt to establish a rival port at Lathrop, eight miles to the westward; but its efforts have been as futile as would its threat to establish a rival to San Francisco on the Oakland flats. Stockton has the start, and with the natural advantages controlled by its intelligent and enterprising citizens, it is sure to keep it. Ten miles to the northeastward of Stockton is

Mokelumne Station.

A lively place of some three hundred inhabitants. It is one of the many small towns in that section that the railroad has called into being, and, considering its infancy, it is quite a respectable looking. Here the Mokelumne Hill, Camanche, Lancha Plana and Campo Seco stages connect with the cars. Leaving Mokelumne, and ascending that road, we pass over a few miles of level land, without disturbance. We hope that the Rev. Mr. STRAIN will be attentively heard by a large audience.

THE CHINESE QUESTION.

We are much pleased to notice the great months by the sentiment of opposition to the introduction of heathen labor into this country. Only a year ago a large portion of the community were strongly in favor of Chinese immigration. The press also encouraged it, and harsh language was frequently used towards those who were on the opposite side of the question. Now, however, public opinion has changed completely, and scarcely any one is heard to raise a voice for the continuance of the coolie traffic. Practical experience has been too strong and bitter for the due-strung theories of the advocates of cheap labor. A sense of the great evils sure to attend the influx of these heathens has come upon almost every intelligent man in the State. Hence, organizations having for their object the agitation of the Chinese question, are springing up every day. One of the most promising of these is the Workingmen's Alliance, organized in Sacramento on March 11th, at a meeting numerously attended by mechanics, farmers, miners and other laboring men. The Alliance, losing no time, has set to work in the darkness of the fund. The six acre plot on which the building stands was donated by the owners of the Arlo Sieg grant. The principal contributors were Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Hinds, James T. Farley, of Jackson; Messrs Miller, Lodgate & Surface, Hall, Isaacs, Newman, Stewart, Southerland, Edmonds, Martin, Hanley, Winstedt, Finn, Wolsey, Rosh, Iowkill and Bagley, of Ione; and William and Patrick Scully, M. T. Leary and John Fitzsimmons of Jackson Valley. Ione and Jackson valleys are under the pastoral care of Father Power, of Butter Creek, as are also the towns of Jackson and Mokelumne Hill. The stages by way of Galt for Jackson and Sutter Creek pass through Ione. The soil of the valley is a sandy loam, and produces best in moderately wet seasons. Four miles eastward of Ione, across a ridge of high hills, covered with a thick growth of stunted pine and oak, is the small, neat village of Buena Vista, at the head of what is termed

Jackson Valley.

This valley is smaller than Ione, from which it is separated by a ridge of hills already spoken of. A never-failing stream of sparkling water runs through its center throughout the year. It is well wooded, and, altogether, presents a most attractive appearance. The soil is similar to that of Ione; and like, the latter valley, the prosperity of Jackson was long retarded by adverse titles. Most of the old settlers preempted the land and made improvements on the supposition that it belonged to the public domain, but after a few years a Mexican grant was floated over it, which the courts, after many years of expensive litigation, sustained, and the settlers were compelled to buy a second time at high rates. A number of Irishmen are comfortably located in this valley. Indeed, in every part of the State where our countrymen have taken themselves to farming, they are doing well, and are among the most respected citizens of the country. From Jackson valley we cross over to the once famous mining camps,

Lancha Plana and Camanche.

These towns are about two miles apart, the Mokelumne river, a large and rapid stream, dividing them. Lancha Plana is on the Amador side of the river and Camanche on the Calaveras. After wading the river at Lancha Plana, we pass over a narrow gauge railroad which connects the quartz mills on the Calaveras. Camanche is also connected by rail with Stockton. These towns are now in a very dilapidated condition, and have a most forlorn appearance. The principal of these is owned by Matthew Murray, Esq. Some good veins of coal were discovered a couple of miles northwest of the latter village within the past twelve months, which, should they realize the anticipations of their owners, will do more for the permanent prosperity of that district than its once celebrated placers. Prospecting shafts and tunnels are being run into the coal veins, and evidences of valuable coal fields have been obtained. The coal belt is supposed to extend through that section of the country. The Catholic church is probably the finest sacred edifice in the State outside of San Francisco. An artesian well near the center of the city supplies nearly 250,000 gallons of water daily, which rises nine feet above the level of the street. It is the principal shipping port for the vast agricultural region of the San Joaquin valley. It is connected by rail with Copperopolis, Sacramento, Marysville, etc., and by rail and water with San Francisco. The large number of substantial stores being erected, as well as the air of bustle on the streets, indicated a high state of prosperity; yet the citizens generally complain of dull times, and say that money is not near as plentiful as before the advent of the railroad, and that it was the grand mart of the Southern mines. Certainly the railroad management has evinced no friendly feeling to Stockton, and has gone so far as to attempt to establish a rival port at Lathrop, eight miles to the westward; but its efforts have been as futile as would its threat to establish a rival to San Francisco on the Oakland flats. Stockton has the start, and with the natural advantages controlled by its intelligent and enterprising citizens, it is sure to keep it. Ten miles to the northeastward of Stockton is

Mokelumne Station.

A lively place of some three hundred inhabitants. It is one of the many small towns in that section that the railroad has called into being, and, considering its infancy, it is quite a respectable looking. Here the Mokelumne Hill, Camanche, Lancha Plana and Campo Seco stages connect with the cars. Leaving Mokelumne, and ascending that road, we pass over a few miles of level land, without disturbance. We hope that the Rev. Mr. STRAIN will be attentively heard by a large audience.

Santa Barbara is to have a piening mill.

THE MAGDALEN ASYLUM.

History of the Institution, and Standing of its Work.

An interesting ceremony was performed yesterday at the Magdalen Asylum—laying the corner-stone of a wing of the northern side. As its name implies, in this institution, under charge of the Sisters of Mercy, there is an endeavor to rescue from a life of shame or the down grade of crime, girls and women who, by their own consent or by the advice of friends or under compulsion of the city authorities, are sheltered under its roof, and eventually are restored to society with the hope that they are reformed and respectable. It is under Roman Catholic management, but its charity takes no account of creed; the outcast of all nationalities, of any form of religion, or destitute of religious profession, are cared for alike.

THE HISTORY OF THE INSTITUTION

Will be read with interest. On the 24 December, 1854, eight Sisters of Mercy reached San Francisco from Kinsale, Ireland. In 1855 they purchased a small building on Stockton street, formerly used as a hotel, and there they fitted up a hospital, house of mercy, etc. On the 27th of April, 1856, a certain Protestant woman among the Associates at Assembly, Taylor, having read in one of the daily papers that the Sisters intended in course of time to open a Magdalen Refuge, was sadly beggar to be admitted. She was refused to the Sisters, given a room to herself, and ultimately became one of the best friends the Sisters ever had. Her name is now known among the Associates as Assembly

THE REBELLION OF

SILKEN THOMAS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON, LL. D., M.R.I.A.

PART SIXTH.

When Talbot found himself once more a free man, his first impulse, after pouring forth the most fervent thanks he could express in the good Archbishop, was to bestow every farthing he had in his purse upon the first beggar he met. But his better judgment soon checked this generous impulse, and he began to reflect that the best method of showing his gratitude to his benefactor was to husband his resources, and not to be a burden upon him. Having come to this resolution, he proceeded to the nearest inn, and ordered a hearty meal, which he enjoyed with a relish that he had not known for many days. He then sallied forth into the streets, and began to look about him for some means of getting his bread. He had not gone far when he met a man whom he had known in Dublin, and who, he thought, might be able to assist him. He accosted him, and found that he was a dealer in cattle, and was then on his way to Drogheda to purchase some beasts for the Dublin market. Talbot told him that he was in search of employment, and asked him if he could not get him a situation as drover. The man replied that he could, and that he would be glad to have his company, as he was a stranger in the country, and did not know the roads. Talbot then joined him, and they proceeded together to Drogheda. Here they purchased a number of cattle, and set out on their return to Dublin. They had not gone far when they were overtaken by a heavy fall of rain, which continued for the greater part of the day. Talbot's companion, who was well provided with a horse and cart, invited him to get in and shelter himself from the storm; but Talbot, who was a good pedestrian, preferred walking by the side of the cattle, as he thought he could thus keep them together more easily. They had proceeded in this manner for about two hours, when Talbot's companion, who was riding on before, suddenly turned back, and told him that he had just met a party of soldiers, who were scouring the country in search of rebels, and that he thought it would be advisable to avoid them. Talbot thanked him for his caution, and they both turned off to the left, and drove their cattle into a field which lay at some distance from the road. They then sought shelter in a neighboring cabin, and remained there until the soldiers had passed. They then resumed their journey, and reached Dublin without further interruption.

Talbot's companion was a kind-hearted man, and he would not accept of any remuneration for the trouble he had taken in assisting him. He told him that he was going to Kilcullen, and that he would be glad to have his company, as he was afraid to travel alone, on account of the disturbed state of the country. Talbot gladly accepted the offer, and they set out together. They had not proceeded far when they met a party of soldiers, who were scouring the country in search of rebels. They were commanded by a young officer, who, on seeing Talbot, ordered his men to halt, and rode up to him. He then asked him a number of questions, and, finding that his answers were satisfactory, he told him that he might proceed on his journey. Talbot thanked him, and they parted. Talbot and his companion then proceeded on their journey, and reached Kilcullen without further molestation.

Talbot remained with his companion for some days, and then proceeded to Kilkea Castle, the residence of the Earl of Kildare. He found the castle in the possession of the soldiers, and was informed by the sentinel at the gate that the Earl had left it, and that the Countess was residing in the town of Kilkea. He proceeded to the house indicated, and was ushered into the presence of the Countess, who received him very graciously. She told him that she had received a letter from the Archbishop of Dublin, in which he had informed her that he had sent him to her, and that he had spoken in the highest terms of his character and conduct. She then asked him if he had any relations in Ireland, and he replied that he had a father and mother living in the county of Wicklow, and that he had also a brother in Dublin. She told him that she would write to his father, and that he might remain at the castle until he received an answer. She then ordered refreshments to be brought to him, and left the room.

Talbot remained at the castle for a week, and then received a letter from his father, in which he was informed that he was living in the greatest poverty, and that he had been obliged to sell his farm, and to take refuge in a cabin on the mountains. He also informed him that his brother had been killed in battle, and that his sister had married a man who was a bitter enemy to the English, and who had joined the rebels. He concluded by telling him that he was glad to hear that he was in the service of the Earl of Kildare, and that he hoped he would remain faithful to him, and to the cause which he espoused.

Talbot was deeply affected by the contents of this letter, and he resolved to write to his father, and to endeavor to induce him to abandon the rebellious course which he was pursuing. He wrote to him accordingly, and implored him, in the most affectionate terms, to return to his allegiance, and to avoid the ruin which must inevitably overtake him if he persisted in his present course. He also informed him that he was in the service of the Earl of Kildare, and that he was treated with the greatest kindness by him and his family. He then told him that he had received a letter from his brother, and that he was grieved to hear of his death. He concluded by telling him that he would write to his sister, and endeavor to induce her husband to abandon the rebellion.

Talbot then wrote to his sister, and implored her to use her influence with her husband to induce him to return to his allegiance. He told her that he was in the service of the Earl of Kildare, and that he was treated with the greatest kindness by him and his family. He also informed her that he had received a letter from his father, and that he was grieved to hear of his poverty and distress. He concluded by telling her that he would write to her husband, and endeavor to induce him to abandon the rebellion.

Talbot then wrote to his brother-in-law, and implored him, in the most affectionate terms, to return to his allegiance, and to avoid the ruin which must inevitably overtake him if he persisted in his present course. He also informed him that he was in the service of the Earl of Kildare, and that he was treated with the greatest kindness by him and his family. Rev. Father Coffey died at Goulburn, Australia, February 19. The reverend gentleman, who was, we understand, quite a young man, had been suffering for some years from consumption, and for some considerable time no hope of his recovery was entertained.

On the 24th of April, Rev. Eugene Soda, C. S. S., was ordained priest in St. Benedict's church, Atchison, Kansas, by the Right Rev. Louis M. Fink, O. S. B., Bishop of Leavenworth. On the Sunday following the new priest said his first Mass in the same church and gave first communion to fifty children.

On Easter Sunday morning the Rev. Robert Wheeler, C. C., of Celbridge, county Kildare, breakfasted his last, after a long and painful illness. His death will be greatly regretted by many among the laity and clerical brethren, and it has caused great grief to the people of Celbridge, more especially to the poor, to whom he was always a kind and liberal benefactor.

Last month the remains of Cardinal Adelardo, Bishop of Verona in 1184, who was raised to the purple by Pope Lucius III., were exhumed in the church of San Zeno of that city. The body was found utterly decomposed, except the feet and legs, which were perfect. The vestments in which it was enshrouded were also discovered to be in good preservation and of exquisite beauty.

The Catholic Bishop of Mauritius has petitioned the local Governor for aid to the Catholics, who number 82,000, and can support but one Bishop and twenty-two priests, while the Protestants, who number only 9,000, have a bishop and twelve clergymen, with their colleges receiving a State subsidy of £7,000 per annum, the Catholic college receiving nothing.

The correspondent of the London Standard at Rome telegraphs that the Pope is now in his usual health, and that his rheumatism is almost cured. This, the correspondent says, was all that ailed him. His Holiness is in excellent spirits, but pulled down in appearance by deprivation of his usual open air exercise.

G., Clonakilty, and the Rev. Canon McCarthy, P. P., Marlow, and a great number of the neighboring clergy.

His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. McGettigan appeals to the generous-hearted Irish at home and abroad for contributions to the National Cathedral Armagh, the solemn consecration of which is fixed for August next. Thirty-three years ago the Primate of All Ireland commenced the noble idea of raising a National Cathedral. On Saint Patrick's Day, 1840, the foundation-stone was laid. The cathedral is now rapidly approaching completion; the towers are nearly built, but the roof and the spires will have attained their destined height.

The venerable Alessandro Manzoni, author of the celebrated Italian historical novel, I Promessi Sposi ("The Betrothed,") is living in good health at Milan. He was born on the night of the 8th of March, 1786, a night remarkable for its coldness. A correspondent who visited him lately says that the old gentleman often speaks of the meteorological features of the night of his birth, and that he has inclined to the opinion that it was then the snow fell in great quantities, and an icy north wind blew. Now, in his declining years, he takes a curious pleasure in such slights. When his friends pay him their annual visit on the anniversary of his birthday, if a boisterous wind prevails he accepts the good wishes of his friends with much cheerfulness; but if the night is a snowy one his joy is complete. He passes much of his time in study, and works assiduously at his "History of the French Revolution."

The declination of the chapel attached to the Loretto Convent, Penang, took place on the 16th April. The ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. J., Superior of the Jesuits resident in South Australia, and of the Norwood Mission. The Very Rev. Anthony Sterle, S. J., will continue to hold the office of Superior of the College at Sevenhills. Two more Jesuits for the South Australian Mission are expected to arrive by the next mail, when Father Tappisser will receive a coadjutor at Norwood."

Almost unparalleled distress prevails among the population of the islands of Boffin and Shark, off the coast of Galway. The sheep have died of starvation, and the potato crop of the last year being a failure, the people have no seed to put in the ground. The fishing season has commenced, but the men have no gear, and they cannot obtain nets and lines on credit as they did before.

Captain Annesley, of the Sixth Regiment, stationed at Drogheda, who died a few weeks ago, requested that after his decease a splendid gray charger, value £150, should be shot, and a phaeton of great value should be destroyed. This request was carried out, the charger being shot and the phaeton broken up. The deceased officer bequeathed five shillings per week for the support of a Newfoundland dog.

At the recent sitting of the Sixth Petty Sessions, Kilward Lawrence, the fish buyer, who fired on the crowd during the late riots at Kinsale, appeared to answer the charge of having a revolver in a proclaimed district without a license. He was committed for trial, bail being accepted. Kinsale is now perfectly quiet, the buyers and the fishermen acting in perfect harmony.

The peaceable inhabitants of the village of Lisnaiske, in the vicinity of Belcarra, had a visit from the notorious Irish Fenians, on Sunday, April 6th, when several houses were searched for arms, but with fruitless results. The terrified inmates of families were routed out of bed to admit the intruders; but worse still, the searchers diligently searched the sick beds of members of two of these families.

The little town of Kinsale, on the south coast of Ireland, had just been the scene of a ceremonial that might have tempted the picturesque pen of Carlyle, to the burial of a fisherman recently killed in a riot. From all the ports of the Isle-of-Man, from Lowestoft, from Penzance, from Jersey, from all along the Irish Coast, came such a concourse as a fisherman's funeral seldom draws. Not, indeed, because some thousand fishermen in picturesque costumes; the whole scene powerfully dramatic and impressive.

For the past few weeks the emigrants leaving the port of Drogheda were not much beyond the usual average, but on Monday, 7th April, and again on Monday, 21st, there were crowded sailings, the steamer for Liverpool was excessively. Each one has a quaint story to tell: "Ah! boys, I was here a few years beyond, paid my passage." "I am going to join my family." "The rent was raised, and the times being bad, we could not pay it, so we had to go." "Our lease was up and the landlord put us out." These confessions were, in a few words, subject matter to fill a volume.

The Orangemen of Enniskillen have adopted a resolution indignantly denying certain statements made at the Home Rule demonstration held recently in the Rotunda, Dublin, proclaiming that it is to be inferred that the Orangemen fraternized with the persons who took part in the Home Rule demonstration about a month ago near Enniskillen, and condemning in strong terms statements to be imprudent and mendacious, and records their detestation of all such disreputable conduct on the part of Home Rule, and their firm determination to oppose them by every legitimate means.

In the debate in the House of Commons, April 25th, on the subject of the late Galway election petition, Mr. Butt suggested in the course of his remarks an application of a select committee, consisting of members who are best acquainted with Parliamentary law, to consider the best means of disposing of the seat of a member who has been unseated on petition. He thought that the present act would not be renewed without the most careful consideration of its defects, with a view to their removal. The Attorney General for England admitted that the subject of sending a member who received only a fraction of the votes in the constituency was a matter legislating for consideration. On looking at the whole question, he did not think he would have arrived at the decision the Court of Common Pleas had arrived at in declaring Major French entitled to the seat.

Ireland vs. England.

A very remarkable lecture upon Irish history was delivered in Trinity College, Dublin, on Saturday last, the 26th ult. Early in April 29th, by Mr. Barlow, Professor of Modern History, in the Dublin University, in the course of his discourse the learned Professor said our present grievous wrongs, and our consequent ignorance of this country, its institutions and everything connected with it, which prevailes the ruling nation. It was impossible for an Irishman to travel in England and to mix in general society without being painfully impressed with the fact that the English know about as much if not more of the aboriginal Mexicans, than they do of Ireland. And if the English did not understand us, and ostentatiously proclaim that they don't think it worth while to try to understand us, could it be wondered at that Ireland was in a state of chronic discontent? And could they wonder that England does regard as with contempt? The great cause of our political degradation was, he believed, our want of union. No one could have failed to be struck with the fact that in the House of Commons to manage the affairs of which Ireland formed a constituent part, but without being convinced that some great change is inevitable before long. But if ever Home Rule comes to us, Mr. Barlow said, it would come with a blessing or a curse according to the answer we could give on that day to this question: Have the Catholics and the Protestants of this country, not in word and tongue, but in truth, been fused into one nation, united and reconciled? These observations were greeted with loud applause.

Medical Blunders.

In all the period when surgeons applied their salves to weapons instead of wounds to the greatest waste ages the medical profession has often seemed singularly inane side with disease in its conflicts with the human system. Even yet, in spite of the teachings and warnings of experience, some physicians believe in depleting their patients, already seriously attenuated by sickness, with powerful evacuants, emetics, salivants, cathartic and plasters, or the like. But, practically, there is little intelligence in a crowd of medical fossils who belong, of right, in the era of the Crusades! The powerful ally of nature in its warfare with the causes of sickness, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has opened the eyes of the masses to the paramount importance of increasing the vital strength of the body when menaced by disease. Thus, and only thus, when the stomach, the controlling organ of health, is kept in a healthy condition, will the whole system be thoroughly nourished, and thus enable it to resist and expel the depressing influence of an intermittent or remittent. If the constitutional and natural powers were always recruited in the presence of danger, the mortality from consumption, hypochondria, rheumatism, etc., would be much less than it now is. The causes will it possess troops, colds, epidemics, diphtheria, and catarrh seldom affect a healthy digestive system; and of these the best preparation Hostetter's Bitters has proved the most reliable. It is conceded that this standard tonic is a specific for the long and tedious maladies, as well as for the more superficial and intermittent, but it is unhesitatingly asserted that it is the best known safeguard against all the atmospheric elements of disease.

THE STORY OF BLESSED IMELDA.

WHO DIED OF JOY AND LOVE ON MAKING HER FIRST COMMUNION.

We have seen the following in several of our exchanges, but we do not know to which to give credit:

Imelda Lambertini is the subject of whom I speak. She lived years, held power and splendor, as a nun within her cell.

Her every action was carried with such zeal to things divine,

That she proved to quit the palace and draw closer to the shrine.

Scarce ten for a convent, where the Sisters held the rule

Of great and glorious pursuit, for her cradle and her school;

And those who saw her spirit, did she work or did she pray,

Beheld the seed of pious teaching in her young heart day by day.

Imelda's parental hired such sun that she drew sight,

And never knew but rest and power for the habit passing bright.

Another word of holy counsel fell like music on her ear

And while her heart, spurgeoning made in goodly fruit appear.

So Imelda Lambertini had a teacher in the shrine, Where the hideous God imbued with a sense of things divine.

And when all her young companions were at play Came Imelda to the altar, and knelt down before her lord.

So they relined into her spirit, so they grew into her heart

The high secrets of the altar, that they swelled her soul apart.

She yearned, with warmest pleadings, that her Maker might be admitted

Into Sisters God who bathed her in his tenderness.

For the cross who heard her pleading, and had pity While they listened her ardent longings yet repelled her, the holy child Imelda made no answer, or no

Never back again all weeping, and knelt down before the altar.

For yearnings rose within her for the glory and her heart beat strong and stronger, with the prayer of her young being in its passionate

Poured up to the Saviour, who awoke in in her breathing,

Like a love bird in the altar, and with stirring rays of light above Imelda, where she kneeled in ecstasy.

Then she saw and wonder, bring the priest the silver host with how Imelda may no longer be

Then upon the banquet she hath longed for up to heaven

Sisters here to her praying, and they hear the Lord's voice again seek her, there's an awful

Silence in the church, and Imelda, with her head bowed

In first impulse to adore,

Is the Lord's host held near to her,

Then she lifts her head and sees

The white host and knows it is the Lord,

Then she lifts her head and sees

The white host and knows it is the Lord,

Then she lifts her head and sees

The white host and knows it is the Lord

Venerable Alessandro Manzoni, author of the celebrated Italian historical novel, I Promessi Sposi ("The Betrothed,") is living in good health at Milan, at the age of ninety-six. A correspondent who visited him later says that the old gentleman retains all of the meteorological features of the night—as narrated to him by his mother—when the snow fell in great quantities, and an icy north wind prevailed. Now, in his declining years he takes a curious pleasure in such nights. When his friends pay him their annual visit when the semi-snowy of his birthday, if the bitter wind prevails he accepts the good wishes of his friends with much cheerfulness; but if the day is a warm one the joy is complete. One of the most encouraging signs of the times is the fact that Orangemen at Kenil-kilken gave a loan of their drums to the Home Rulers for their demonstration, for which these returned a cordial vote of thanks, that we second as cordially.

Recently a boat's crew, belonging to Fethard, county Wexford, caught, at one haul, the extraordinary number of eight hundred mullet, and at another two hundred, making a thousand mullet taken in a week. The fish were of the largest size, and were in fine condition. The great take of fish occurred in Fethard Bay.

Almost unparalleled distress prevails among the population of the islands of Bullin sull Sinark, off the coast of Galway. The peaceful inhabitants of the village of Casanisla, in the vicinity of Belcarra, had a visit from the "loyal Irish" on Monday morning, April 6th, when the several houses were searched for arms, but with fruitless results. The little town of Kinsale, on the south coast of Ireland, has been the scene of a commercial that might have tempted the picturesque pen of Carlyle, in the burial of a fisherman recently killed in a riot. From all the ports of the Isle-of-Man, from Lowestoft, from Penzance, from Lerwey, from all along the Irish Coast, came such a concourse as a fisherman's funeral seldom draws. The procession was of some thousand fishermen in picturesque costumes; the whole scene powerfully dramatic and impressive.

For the past few weeks the emigrants leaving the port of Drogheda were not much beyond the usual average, but on Monday, 7th April, and again on Monday, 21st, the number of emigrants leaving by steamer for Liverpool was extensive. Each one has a quaint story to tell: "My brother, who is a few years beyond, paid the passage," "I am going to join my family," "The rent was raised, and the times being bad, we could not pay it, so we had to go," "Our lease was up and the landlord put us out." The Orangemen of Enniskillen have adopted a resolution indignantly denying certain statements made at the Home Rule demonstration held recently in the Rotunda, Dublin, calculated to lead to the impression that the Orangemen fraternized with the persons who took part in the Home Rule demonstration a month ago near Enniskillen to unveil Colonel Saunderson's statue, and recording their detestation of all such movements as that for obtaining a Repeal of the Irish Act of Union, and their determination to oppose them by every legitimate means.

In the debate in the House of Commons, April 29th, on the petition of the late Galway election petition, Mr. Rutt suggested in the course of the debate that the appointment of a select committee, consisting of members who are best acquainted with Parliamentary law, to consider the best means of disposing of the seat of a member who has been unseated for bribery. He thought the present Act would not be renewed without the most careful consideration of its defects, with a view to their removal. The Attorney General for England admitted that the subject of seating a member who had not a majority of the votes in the constituency was a matter deserving grave consideration. Looking at the whole question, he did not think he would have arrived at the decision the Committee of Privileges had arrived at in declaring Major French entitled to the seat.

Ireland vs. England.

A very remarkable lecture upon Irish history was delivered in Trinity College, Dublin, on Saturday, by the New York Herald of April 28th, by Mr. Barlow, Professor of Modern History, in the Dublin University. In the course of his discourse the learned Professor said our present grievance was the contemptible conduct of this country, its institutions and everything connected with it, which prevades the ruling nation. It was impossible for an Irishman to travel in England and take his place in society without being painfully impressed with the fact that the English know about as much if not more of the aboriginal Mexicans, than they do of the Irish. And if the English did not understand us, and ostentatiously proclaim that fact, don't think it worth while to try to understand us, could it be wondered at that Ireland was a cause of discontent? And would they wonder that England does regard as with contempt? The great cause of our political degradation was, he believed, our want of union. No one could have observed the growing inequality of the House of Commons to manage the affairs of which Ireland formed a constituent part, without being convinced that some great change is inevitable before long. But if ever Home Rule comes to us, Mr. Barlow said, in conclusion, it would come with a blessing or a curse according to the answer we would give on that day to this question: Have the Catholics and the Protestants of this country, not in word and tongue, but in truth, been fused into one nation, united and reconciled? These observations were greeted with loud applause.

Medical Blunders.

From the period when surgeons applied their salves to weapons instead of wounds to the present wide-awake age, the medical profession has often wandered from the paths which disease in its conflicts with the human system. Even yet, in spite of the teachings of remarkable discoveries, some physicians persist in depleting their patients, already seriously exhausted by sickness, with powerful cathartics and nauseous, and sometimes deadly, mixtures. But, providentially, public intelligence is abroad, and more intelligent Leeches who believe, of right, never in the warfare with disease to use weapons which inflict wounds instead of healing. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, has specifically set itself to the purpose of increasing the vital strength of the body when menaced by disease. They understand that when the atmospheric conditions are adverse to health, it is wise to fortify the system with a tonic—some kind of a tonic—and thus enable it to combat and repel the depressing influence of an invisible but powerful enemy. If the constitutional powers are overtaxed by the assault, and the system is in imminent danger, the mortality from consumption, fever and ague, bilious remittent, would be much less than it is. Even the severe shock of nervous prostration, dyspepsia, liver complaint and intermittent, but it is unhesitatingly asserted that it is the best known safeguard against all the attendant forms of disease.

IRELAND.

At St. Mary's Cathedral, Cork.

During the past week, a course of exercises suitable for the working classes was conducted by the Rev. Canon MacNamara, in connection with the Society of the Immaculate Heart. The numbers that attended at the church each day were very large, and all seemed to be deeply impressed by the importance of the devotions in which they were engaged. On Wednesday and Friday, Canon MacNamara in the course of his remarks referred to the prevailing vice of drunkenness, and most earnestly recommended all to become members of the Association of Prayer, a society which has already done so much towards the repression of this soul-saving crime. That the words of the reverend gentleman made a deep impression on his listeners was evident from the large numbers that were enrolled on the books of the Association after last Mass. The week's devotions concluded at eight o'clock Mass on Sunday morning, when there was a general communion of the Society of the Immaculate Heart, as well as for all others who had engaged in the exercises of the week. The number of communicants was very large. After Vespers, the Rev. Canon MacNamara preached an eloquent and impressive sermon on the virtue of perseverance, after which a solemn renewal of baptismal vows took place. The ceremony was a most impressive one. The whole congregation knelt down with lighted candles in their hands, and, as they repeated, after the priest, as if with one voice, the solemn renewal of their baptismal vows, it was impossible not to be touched by this open renunciation of the world and the spontaneous offering of the heart's best affections to God. Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament followed, after which the vast congregation separated. On Trinity Sunday the candidates were of an unusually impressive character at the Church of the Capuchins. High Mass commenced at twelve o'clock, the celebrant being the Rev. Father Alphonsus; deacon, Rev. Father Bernard; and master of ceremonies, Very Rev. Father Cherubino. The High Altar was ornamented with a profusion of the most beautiful flowers, while a multitude of lights glittered between the leaves. The choir, under the direction of Mr. Morse, sang selections from the compositions of Haydan and Mozart. At four in the afternoon Vespers was Complins, followed by Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament, before which was sung Rossi's "Tantum Ergo." The numbers who attended throughout the day and in the evening were very large.—Catholic Opinion, June 14.

First Meeting of Ulster Catholic Association.

On Monday, June 24, there was held in the Music Hall, Belfast, the first meeting of an Association which has long been needed in Ulster, and is destined, we believe, to achieve great good for the popular cause in that part of the country. From the Belfast Examiner we condense the following synopsis of the aims and determinations of the Association:—We are not advocates of sectarianism. We believe that an honest, straightforward Protestant is immeasurably superior to a cringing Catholic. On this principle we have hitherto acted, and shall continue to act hereafter. But although we believe that religion of itself should not be supported directly in Ulster, In Belfast—the vast majority of the Liberal party being Catholics—a low noisy Presbyterian selected a candidate without even consulting the Catholic portion of the constituency. The same happened in Derry and in Newry. Such a humiliating circumstance as this shall not again occur. Any selection made without a previous consultation with the Catholic community will be disregarded. No hole-and-corner meetings will settle the representation of our constituency. The so called Liberal Association shall have forth cease to dictate to the Catholics of Belfast. Our own youthful and energetic Association will assume the full responsibility of directing the Catholic vote of Ulster, and under fair terms are given to it, we will vindicate our manhood and independence. The Ulster Catholic Association is determined to weld into a solid mass the electorial force of every Ulster constituency. As one man will the vote of the province be directed. Henceforth we shall have no more Liberals. We shall know our men, and write our bargain before we support any candidate. A Whig dictatorship has ended sway forever. In her then bend again under the humiliations which we have hitherto suffered from this party, we are prepared to support, if necessary, the rankest Tory. Henceforth we shall not be sheep in the hands of the slaughter, but men maintaining their independence.

The Maguire Fund.

The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury have forwarded to the trustees of the Maguire Fund the promised Government contribution of £250. This munificent sum from the "Bounty" Fund is given, it is particularly stated, by command of her Majesty, "on the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, for the benefit of Mrs. Maguire, in recognition of her husband's literary merits in writing the life of the late Rev. Theobald Mathew"—and for nothing else. This statement will serve to remind many of Ireland's children that John Francis Maguire did write a book on the Apostle of Temperance; but they will wonder why that has been chosen for special mention in the career of a man who deserved well of his country.—The Queen. Distinctions are sometimes as unfortunate as invidious, and it was necessary to specify something. Mr. Maguire's police have too honestly pronounced; such works as his "Pontificate of Pius IX." were not at the question; but the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone," a most competent judge of "literary (and other) merit," should have secured the grant on broad and safe generalities, without particularizing the minor work of an honest public man, who has left behind that which his own country remembers, that it may have a lasting place in the political memory of the responsible adviser of the Crown. However, we will not look a gift horse too sufficiently close in the mouth to prove that he has not cut his wisdom teeth.—Catholic Opinion, June 14.

The Home Rule Movement.

The Home Rule Association held another gathering in their rooms in Dublin on the 30 June. The principal object of the meeting seemed to be that of rebutting the assertions made by Professor Farley in his recent lecture in Trinity College, on the religious and other difficulties in the way of a union of Irishmen. In his remarks on the subject Mr. Isaac Butt protested against the language of the professor, who was of opinion that measures inimical to Protestant liberty would be passed in an Irish Parliament if such were established on College Green. With the experience they had of their Cat'o l fellow-countrymen it was, he said, "Worse than folly—it was a crime —to believe that they could be capable of passing any measure hostile to Protestant liberties, even if they dared. He protested against this language, not only as an Irishman, but as a Protestant. They could not, he declared, put Protestantism in any more odious position before the eyes of the civilized world than to say that the Protestants of Ireland could not maintain their own liberties except at the price of selling their country to the domination of a nation that looked upon them with commensurate ignorance." Notwithstanding the efforts that are being made by a section of Protestants to frighten their co-religionists from the Home Rule movement, the cause makes great progress throughout Ireland, and among Protestants, too.

The following items are from the Dublin Nation of June 14th:

Watershed Spirit.—There is cheering news from Waterford. On Wednesday there was a meeting in the Urbs Intacta at which Mr. Hugh Helnrick, the organising secretary of the Home Government Association, attended, in company with the members of the leading local electors, and at which, after some very patriotic addresses had been delivered, a resolution was unanimously passed adopting the Federal programme. Steps were subsequently taken to hold a public meeting on a large scale on Monday to further advance the national cause in Waterford county as well as Waterford city.

The Jury Act.—The Committee on the Jury Act is still engaged in prosecuting its investigation, but it is not getting any novel evidence. Since our last issue Mr. Robinson, Q. C., Chairman of Cavan, and Mr. Thomas Nicholson, Sheriff of Wexford, have, among others, been examined; and of these the former gave testimony for the amendment of the Act, and the latter for its favor. Mr. Robinson repeated the charges made against the jurors at the last Assizes, and his principal suggestions towards an amendment of Lord O'Hagan's enactment were that a majority of the higher class for the Assizes, and the power for Quarter Sessions, and give the Sub-Sheriff the power of selection, which was vested in the High Sheriff. Mr. Nicholson, while suggesting some amendments, would preserve strictly the great principle of the present system, which, he thought, would work very well.

Professor Barlow.—Professor Barlow's recent utterances on Irish history have at least set a large number, both of the opponents and friends of the National cause, thinking seriously of the Home Rule question. Several meetings have been held and discussed at the meeting of the Home Government Association on Tuesday. Mr. Denis S. Sullivan, D. L., proposed a resolution which, while declaring that the Association did not adopt all the conclusions of Professor Barlow, nevertheless thanked him for "his able and eloquent discussion of the question of the Rule for Ireland." Mr. Sullivan, Mr. Austin, Mr. Butt, the Rev. Mr. Carroll, Mr. Dennehy, J. F., Mr. D. S. Sullivan, and the Chairman, Mr. Isaac Butt, M. P., took part. We sincerely regret to record the commission on Saturday last of a barbarous murder at Tipperary in the county Limerick. The victim was a man named Patrick Mitchell, steward and gem. manager of the property of a Mr. Gubbins, and was shot down in the middle of the day near his own dwelling. From the fact that some disputes had taken place between Mitchell and some of Mr. Gubbins' tenants it has been inferred that the crime is of an agrarian nature. It is stated, however, that no eviction has taken place on the property in question—that, in fact, all the tenants holds their farms under lease; and therefore, prima facie, it would appear that none of the tenants had any great provocation to be guilty of so fearful an enormity as that of deliberate murder. Nevertheless two of them, or rather two members of one family living on Mr. Gubbins' land, have been arrested on suspicion.

Priests and People.—Still they come! Another body of the true hearted priests of Ireland have put forth a pronouncement in favor of Home Rule and Liberty which will cause a thrill of joy in the hearts of Irishmen. It is from Dallen, diocese of Achonry, and this trumpet-blast of freedom comes. On Sunday morning last, the 22nd of that January met under the presidency of the venerable Dean Curran, and adopted a series of resolutions which evidence in the most manly and emphatic language that self-government is an absolute necessity for Ireland, and that it is idle and vain to expect justice from the London Parliament; and which in equally explicit language pledge the reverend signatories to the support of the present programme of the restoration of our great national right. The meeting was largely fished out in 1890. Finally, in the letter containing these resolutions, the Very Rev. Dean Curran formally requests Lord Bandon and sixteen of his brother priests as certified members of the Home Government Association.

Shaw Crime. — The hobgoblin terrors which are daily dished up for us as proofs of the utter lawlessness and demoralization of the population will probably after a time be properly appreciated; but those who honor the fair fame of the country cannot be too prompt in stripping the gnashing caricature of the embellishments which they owe to the spirit of exaggeration or invention. We have to thank the author of "Cong for an amusing exposure of one of the "outrages" gravely held up by a morning paper as an event which would have strengthened the Government opinion as to the advisability of the renewal of the Coercion Act. The occurrence in question, which took place in one contemporary's column as a "robbery in Kaye" resolves itself upon examination into the rather common place fact that an enraged husband broke an ash sway with a basket of bread. We shall probably next hear of the larceny of a turnip described as a terrible result of agrarianism, or the sparing of a salmon set forth as an appalling proof of the murderous instincts of the people.

Depopulation.—Part after part of the Census of Ireland for the decennial period ending in 1871, as it is issued for the press, tells the same mournful tale of the progressing depopulation of ury. The statistics of the county have just been published. Like all these are statisms of ruin and decay, the population of the county 826,784 in 1841, it was 140,768—a losso persons within the less yeas61, the numbers had come down to—a loss of 30,375 persons within thing ten years. In 1871, the rural further dwindled to 90,358, a redd 14,815 since the period of the last. These figures show that within twenty-five years the county of Me the upstation of English rule, hasdeprived of 56,279 of its people. To only a few thousand more than imber in the county at present. As in of the population is still going city, it is easy to conjecture how thes will stand ten or twenty years if English rule be not abolished ind.

Roscommon Election.—national cause will score a victory tommon. Laying of the First Stone of a Nemotinal church.

On Saturday the ex Empress of the French laid the foundation stone of a new chapel, to be dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, adjoining the church of St. Mary's Chilsehurst, where rests the ashes of the Emperor Napoleon and other members of the Imperial family. The new building will be twenty four feet in length by twelve feet in width. In the center of the building, under the altar, will be placed the beautiful sarcophagus, presented by the Empress the Queen, containing the remains of the illustrious pagan dead. The ceremony was conducted in the most quiet manner, in fact, but very few even in the pass the village of Chilsehurst at which the Queen was awaiting on Saturday morning to[illegible] sightseers from London and elsewhere; all had arrived in good time to see the show, and one put in its place without hitch or disappointment. Universe in England.

One of the most Parliamentary mouthpieces is to give a special performance in the British House of Commons on Friday, the 4th of July. The piece selected for the presentation is not a new one, but in the hands of the fashionable gentleman who has made it so peculiarly his own it is always intensely amusing. Under its new title "The Monastic Universal Lunatic," it may however be not recognizable by the general run of people, but when it is made known that this is nothing more than the talented name for the highly entertaining farce in which Mr. Newdegate has been figuring in every session of Parliament for many years in succession, and that he is to sustain his original part in it—that of the monastic-the forthcoming interesting occasion, the interest in and pleasure of which is fully exposed to view. Putting metaphor aside, the distinguished representative for North Warwickshire has given notice that he will inaugurate the fog days by calling her Majesty's ministers' attention and the attention of Parliament to the necessity for further inquiry into the increase and character of monastic and conventual institutions in Great Britain, and to conclude with a motion." The House of Commons has no doubt quite enough of this species of chronic madness, but its capabilities of enjoying a joke are extensive, and no doubt the world-wide notoriety of conventual inquisitor will be able to secure an audience. Even the Duke of Parliament will be chiefly owing to the generosity of the association alluded to. At the meeting of the Duke's tenantry exacted her love, occupied the chair, and was supported by Prince Von Wambolt, Falck, Bandit and others. The great feature of the however, among the Catholics of Germany is now to speak less and to act more; it is by its fruits that the association must be known. The proceedings were concluded by a pilgrimage to Maienthal, headed by the Bishop of Mayence, Herr von Ketteler, and followed by many thousands of pilgrims from the same cause.

The resolutions on the health of the Holy Father in every way complete—the reexceptions are numerous.

We will give you five hundred francs to the messenger who shall announce to me the death of Pius IX." was the hateful device of the unhappy man Renard only a few days before his own last breath at Versailles. Here is a new but kindred form of government would now be tolerated there. How is it, then, that the Spaniards do not pour out their rich blood freely and raise a levy en masse to extinguish Carlism and give power and solidity to the Republican Government? To us it seems quite clear that they hold back because they are Monarchists, and detest the Republic. At all events it is not by the perpetual publication of falsehood and calumny that the thing called the Madrid Government can maintain itself. A scandalous instance of these vile tactics was furnished at the close of last week. The Carlists were in a commanding position at Irun. A company of Republican Carabineers, to draw them off, hoisted the white flag. The ruse succeeded so far that the Carlists descended, and advanced towards the flag, but the moment they came within range the Republicans fired upon them, and then fled. The Carlists rushed after them with fixed bayonets, but were shot down in numbers by the fire of the Republican reserve. In a few days later, Bateman sold his interest in El Dorado county, in which he cleared a handsome sum. Bateman left on the first morning train, bound to Sacramento.

A few days later, Bateman related to McNevin the circumstances of meeting Adams, and what he said about new discoveries of gold in El Dorado county, remarking in a joking way, "That may be the spot you dreamed about, as that country is well worded."

McNevin's spirits seemed to revive, and he clapped his hands together in ecstacy, announcing with apparent joy, and to the surprise of his friend, that he would leave upon the following day in search of the reported gold regions.

Two weeks after their parting Bateman received a letter from McNevin. It commenced: "Eureka! Found at last! I know the spot as the panorama opened to me on my approach through the valley. Part of my dream in reality is now before my eyes." Then followed a glowing account of the mine, its prospective wealth, and a description of the surrounding country, ending with urging his friend to come and help him complete the purchase. Bateman said it was impossible for him to leave then, but he would send an expert to examine the property, and see if he should invest his money in the enterprise. He also stated that he would meet the expert, Roberts, at Auburn, a station on the Central Pacific Railroad, on a certain day to get the report. If McNevin would be there on that day he would decide about letting him have money to complete the purchase. McNevin had already paid Robert Duran $5,000.

On the day designated Bateman's letter, two trains met at Auburn station to pass each other. The one going south contained Bateman, who got off there to meet the expert Roberts and receive his report of the mine. Roberts said the mine was easy of access, where McNevin was located, and would not prove to be of any value, and in his opinion was no mine at all.

As the northern train started on its course, Roberts bade Bateman good day and sprang on board. A moment after McNevin drove up to the station, and grasping his friend by the hand, asked what kind of a report the expert gave of the mine. Bateman informed McNevin what Roberts had said, and while they were in earnest conversation in the station buildings, the train for the south took its departure, and left the two miners to spend the then fast approaching night in that lonely spot. McNevin was amazed at the report of the expert, denying it as false, calling it a false fabrication; and, nothing daunted, renewed his desire for his friend to go and see it, and entreated for aid in the enterprise.

Bateman finally consented, and gave check for the balance due on the property, and the two started on their journey. In a few days they reached Sacramento, where he was also well known in San Francisco, having kept a grocery in the first precinct of the Twelfth Ward for several years. Two years ago he removed with his family to Greenwood, where he has since been doing a steadily increasing business. There is also a brewery, owned by McGonigle & Muhlbach, whose beer is so much prized in that section that the demand exceeds the supply.

THE CEDERBERG MINE.

About two and a half miles northwest of Greenwood, at the head of American Cañon, and overlooking the Middle Fork of the American river, is the well-known Cederberg mine, one of the most remarkable quartz formations yet found in California. It is divided into three distinct parts and has three distinct shades of character. Adopting the phraseology of the Shasta gentleman, there is the "bull ledge," "the platform ledge," and "the Cederberg seams." The latter are a succession of quartz seams, from two to eight inches in thickness, and constituted the original discovery by Cederberg and Hansen. These seams occur in the rocky face of the bluff hillside, from which there appears to have been a slide. Cederberg, when he first commenced prospecting for this quartz, had become satisfied that the mountain was the source of the gold, which will give one no idea how rich it must be when it will pay to work it in this primitive fashion. There are 1,200 by 1,400 feet in the claim, of which T. G. Beltz, the Superintendent, owns 800, the remaining 600 being equally divided between W. A. Cornwall, Vincenzi Antonelli and A. Muriatta. It is truly international and cosmopolitan in character. Beltz is a German, married to an Irish woman, from whom he has learned to talk Irish with the accent of a native born sile of Connemara; Cora, wall is an American, formerly an engineer on the Atlantic and Pacific Railroads; Antonelli is an Italian, and claims to be a cousin of the Pope's celebrated Prime Minister, Cardinal Antonelli; and Muriatta is a Mexican, through whose veins flow the Aztec and Castilian blood. We did not inquire whether he was allied by blood to his namesake Joaquin Muriatta, but we shouldn't wonder.

There are some other quartz mines in the vicinity of Greenwood, but we didn't have time to visit them. There is quite a respectable Irish and Catholic population in the district, whose spiritual wants are attended to by Father Nagle of Placerville.

THE EXILE'S RETURN.

Fair land of my heart, once again do I see thee,
Where in boyhood I roamed o'er the valley and mountain;
Once again are the scenes of my childhood to greet me
With the green grassy hills and the ware-beaten shore.

And long weary years o'er thee have been heap'd with sorrow
Have passed on the swift fleeting pinions of time
Since I followed the banner that pointed me onward,
To a far distant home o'er the deep flowing brine.

But of the hare I dreamed through the long dreary hours;
'Twas thy grief that awakened my heart's deepest sigh—
'Twas the thought of thee, Erin, oppressed and in sorrow,
That drove nerveless and the hot tear in mine eye.

And oft have I sighed, when my memory carried
Me back to thy shores, mossy I is of the sea,
For the day when thy sons, be their skin dark, could wrest thee
From tyrants, and make thee yet happy and free.

And still, though I see all my bright hopes unheeded,
While over love the red flag of tyranny hung,
Though thy freedom and life seemed forever departed,
Still to thee my fond heart in memory clung.

And tonight, could the day of my love for thee serve,
Though the changes of fifty sitted rapidly over,
One hope through the years of my exile sustained me—
Whether free or oppressed, to be buried in thee.

And again, amid the scenes of my youth's early hours,
Before me appear all the bright hopes of my dream;
The morning's sweet prayer and the vesper's glad hours,
And the valleys all robed in their mantle of green.

Alas, no; I hear the sweet songster's note swelling
Through the still, leafy wildwood, o'er mountain and moor;
The soft loving herds in the valleys so verdant,
And the voice of the ark on the far distant shore.

But where 'mid these scenes full of bright recollection,
So fair, dear and fair, and so dear to the view,
Is the little thatched roof of my own humble dwelling,
Where I early years of my infancy flew?

And where are the fond, loving forms to greet me
That guarded my childhood, so fondly and true?
Where are they, my sister, my brother, my mother?
Fled where no sobs are? Ever beyond the blue?

"They are gone," sigh the winds as they silently
Pass by;
And pause 'mid the ones mossy graves to repeat
"They are gone," sigh the winds as they silently
Pass by;
Where the sow is in silence and still slumbers deeply,
Where the sun is shadows of earth may have power,
Where thou o'er the far distant ocean wert cast."

And down to my grave may the old abbey church,

At St. Mary's Cathedral, Cork.

During the past week a course of exercises suitable for the working classes was conducted by the Rev. Canon MacNamara, in connection with the Society of the Immaculate Heart. The numbers that attended at the church each day were very large, and all seemed to be deeply impressed by the importance of the devotions in which they were engaged. On Wednesday and Friday Canon MacNamara in the course of his remarks referred to the prevailing vice of drunkenness, and spoke most earnestly recommended all to become members of the Association of Prayer, a society which has already done so much towards the repression of this enslaving crime. That the words of the reverend gentleman made a deep impression on his listeners was evidenced from the large numbers that were enrolled on the books of the Association after last sermon. The week's devotions concluded at eight o'clock Mass on Sunday morning, when there was a general communion of the Society of the Immaculate Heart, as well as for all others who had engaged in the exercises of the week. The concluding exercises of the week took place in the evening, when Canon MacNamara preached an eloquent and impressive sermon on the subject of perseverance, which was followed by the solemn renewal of baptismal vows took place. The ceremony was a most impressive one. The whole congregation knelt down with lighted candles in their hands, and as they repeated, after the priest, at his baptism, the solemn renewal of their baptismal vows, it was impossible not to be touched by the spontaneous offering to the world and the spontaneous rejection of the devil. Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament followed, after which the vast congregation separated. On which the vast congregation separated. On Trinity Sunday the ceremonies were of an unusually impressive character at the Church of the Capuchins. High Mass commenced at twelve o'clock, the celebrant being the Rev. Father Alphonsus; deacon, Rev. Father Bernard; and master of ceremonies, Very Rev. Father Chrysostom. The High Altar was ornamented with a profusion of the most beautiful flowers, while a line of lights glittered between each of the multitude of lights glittered between each of the numerous statues. The most beautiful positions of Haydn and Mozart. At four o'clock in the evening there was Compline, followed by Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament, before which was sung Rossini's "Tantum Ergo." The numbers who received Holy Communion during the day and evening was very large.—Catholic Opinion, June 14.

Great Meeting of the Ulster Catholic Union.

On Monday, June 24, there was held in the Music Hall, Belfast, the first meeting of an Association which has long been needed in Ulster, and is destined, we believe, to achieve great good for the popular cause in that part of the country. From the Belfast Examiner we condense the following synopsis of the aims and determinations of the Association: "We are not afraid of the word sectarianism. We believe that an honest, straightforward Protestant is immeasurably superior to a lukewarm Catholic. On this we have hitherto acted, and we shall continue to act evermore. But although we believe that the religion of itself should not weigh in political selection, we believe that the opinion of the majority should have great weight. If a Liberal, or conservative, or so-called Liberal-Conservative, instead of five unadulterated Catholics and one fiery Presbyterian, we cannot see fifty Presbyterians should be masters of the situation, but should dictate terms to the other fifty, and stringently dictate terms they will. And yet this is exactly what has happened hitherto in Ulster. In Belfast—the vast majority of the Liberal party being Catholics—a few noisy Presbyterians selected a candidate without even consulting the Catholic portion of the constituency. The same happened in Derry and in Newry. Such a humiliating circumstance should not again occur. Any selection made without a previous consultation with the Catholic community will be disregarded. No Catholic community will settle the representation of great constituencies. The so-called Liberal Association shall hence-forth cease to dictate to the Catholics of Belfast. Our object is to secure the full recognition of Catholic rights, to secure the stability of directing the Conservative party to Ulster, and thereby fair play for Ireland, and indeed we will vindicate our manly independence. We will vindicate our manly independence. We are determined to weld into a solid mass the material force of every Catholic constituency. At one man Home-rule sea shall have no dominion. At one man Home-rule sea shall have no dominion. We will not barter our birthright for any mess of pottage. We will not barter our birthright for any mess of pottage. We will not be cajoled, we will not be bullied, we will not be bribed, we will not be cheated, we will not be lured, we will not be frightened into the pens, as if we were sheep, we will not be sheep driven to their independence."

The Magnire Fund.

The Lords Commissioners of the Treasury have forwarded to the Trustees of the Maguire Fund the promised Royal contribution of £200. This munificent sum (the gift of "Bunny") Fund is given, it is particularly stated, by command of her Majesty, upon the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, for the benefit of Rev. Rev. Father Alphonsus; descendant of the Rev. Father Alphonsus; descendant of the Rev. Father Bernard; and master of ceremonies, Very Rev. Father Chrysostom. The High Altar was ornamented with a profusion of the most beautiful flowers, while a line of lights glittered between each of the numerous statues. The most beautiful positions of Haydn and Mozart. At four o'clock in the evening there was Compline, followed by Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament, before which was sung Rossini's "Tantum Ergo." The numbers who received Holy Communion during the day and evening was very large.—Catholic Opinion, June 14.

The Home Rule Movement.

The Home Rule Association held another gathering in their rooms in Dublin on the 3d June. The principal object of the meeting seemed to be that of rebutting the recent lecture in Trinity College, on the religious and other difficulties in the way of a union of Irishmen. In his remarks on the subject Mr. Isaac Butt protested against the language of the professor, who was of opinion that measures inimical to Protestant liberty would be carried in an Irish Parliament. If such were established on College Green. With the experience they had had of their Catholic countrymen it was not to be said. "Worse than folly—it was a crime to believe that they would be capable of such a thing." The Association was determined to passing any measure hostile to Protestant liberties, even if they dared. He protested against this language, not only as an Irishman, but as a Protestant. They could not, man, but as a Protestant. They could not, he declared, put Protestantism in a more odious position before the eyes of the civilized world than to say that the Protestants of Ireland could not maintain their own liberties except at the price of selling their country to the domination of a nation that looked upon them with contemptuous ignorance." Notwithstanding the efforts that are being made by a section of Protestants to frighten their co-religionists from the Home Rule movement, the cause makes great progress throughout Ireland, and among Protestants, too.

The following items are from the Dublin Nation of June 14th:

WATERFORD SPIRIT.—There is cheering news from Waterford. On Wednesday their was a meeting in the Urbs Jubecis at which Mr. Hugh Heinrick, the organising secretary of the Home Government Association, attended, in company with several of the leading electors, and at which, after a very spirited address, had been elected Irverel, a resolution was unanimously passed adopting the Federal programme. Steps were subsequently taken to hold a public meeting on a large scale on Monday next, for further advance the national cause in Waterford county as well as Waterford city.

THE JURY ACT.—The Committee on the Irish Jury Act is still proceeding with its investigation, but is not getting any novel evidence. Since our last issue Mr. Robinson, Q. C., Chairman of Cavan, and Mr. Thomas Nicholson, Subsheriff of Wexford, have been among others, been examined; and of those the former gave testimony for the opponents of the Act, and the latter in favor of it. Mr. Robinson repeated the charge made against the jurors at the last Assizes, and his principal suggestions towards an amendment of Lord O'Hagan's enactment were to suppress the right of challenge for the cause, to appoint a poorer for Quarter Sessions Assizes, and the Subsheriff the power of selection and return, with the reserve to the High Sheriff. Mr. Nicholson, while suggesting some amendments, would preserve the principle of the present system, which, he thought, would work very well.

PROFESSOR BARLOW.—Professor Barlow's recent utterances on Irish history have at least set a large number, both of the opponents and friends of the National cause, thinking seriously of the Home Rule question. They constituted the principal topic discussed at the meeting of the Irish National Association on Tuesday. Mr. Denis S. Sullivan, D. L., proposed a resolution which, while admitting the ability displayed by the professor in the language of his criticism, denied the justice of his opinion that measures inimical to Protestant liberty would be carried in an Irish Parliament. IRISH PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION.

Nation of June 14th:

Conversts in England.

One of the twin Parliamentary moundebanks is to give a special performance in the British House of Commons on Friday, the 4th of July. The place selected for re-presentation is not a new one, but in the hands of the honorable gentleman who has made it so peculiarly his own it is always intensely amusing.

"The Manchester Conventual Lunatic," is by no means new but recognizable by the general run of people, but what it is more known that this is nothing more than the assumed name for the highly screaming parson in which Mr. Newdegate has been figuring in every session of Parliament for the last twenty years, and that he is to many years in succession, and that he is to sensible in his original part in it—that of the humbug—on the forthcoming interesting occasion, the interest in and pleasure of the casion, the interest in and pleasure of the thing is fully exposed to view. Putting metaphor aside, the distinguished representative for North Warwickshire has given notice that he will inaugurate the day given and the attention of Parliament to the necessity for further inquiry into the nature and character of monkish and conventual institutions in Great Britain, and the sanctions and pleasure of the House to conclude with a resolution. The House can have no doubt quite enough of this species of chronic madness, but the capabilities of enjoying it are not exhausted and the whole would be monastic and conventual inquisitor will not the time of Parliament be wasted with incessant idiocy for a month to come? Why not have a session against monks as well as against canine madness? Many a company would be pleased and clear rooms would be compulsorily managed during the hot season.—London Universe, June 14.

Death of a Dundee Merchant.

We much regret to have to announce to-day the death of Mr. Charles Thiebault, a well-known and highly respected merchant, which took place on the 5th of June, at Paris. The deceased was in the Rolo Association, and of the Catholic Association in the town of Castlerea. Both bodies have publicly declared that they will not support any candidate who will not expressly pledge himself to support the Home Rule platform, and the case of Castlerea there have gone so far as to define that platform to mean the Federal Government sketched by the Home Rule Association of Dublin.

LORD JOHN ON IRELAND.—Lord Russell's insatiable passion for talk has led him to make a long and pretentious speech on the Irish question, and even to bring in a bill for the better government of Ireland." The speech—into which the Peal Act, the ameliorative measures of recent years, the labors of Bodkin and Judge Lawson, the Education Bill and Judge Lawson, the Education Bill and Judge Lawson, the Education Bill and, of course, his Dominions Cardel Cullen, and his Holiness the Pope, were all dragged in one after another—outlined intellectual dose combined with a hatred of Catholicism and of Ireland which is as strong as that which the Irish people feel for the authors of the Durham Letter. The bill could only have come from old Lord John, and it is only in keeping with the entire of the Irish Catholic Church that which Lord John has introduced. Like every English statesman nowadays, Russell admits that Ireland is misgoverned in the past, but denies that the misgovernment is continued. Like all Irish statesmen, he would not redress such evils as remain and to redress such evils as remain and to redress such evils as remain and to

But the Church lives on forever.

Archbishop PURCELL, of Cincinnati, dedicated the Church of the Holy Cross in that city for the Passionist Fathers, the Order of St. Paul, of the Cross, on Sunday, the 22d of last month. The Catholic Telegraph takes its notice of the dedication from the Enquirer of that city, from which we quote as follows:

In November, 1841, a great company assembled on Mt. Adams to attend the ceremonies of laying the corner-stone of the Cincinnati Observatory. Standing and hear an oration from JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, the ex-President of the United States. In that vast throng ADAMS arraigned the Catholic Church for the persecution of Galileo, and avenged him as the friend of science. Now the Observatory has bought other quarters and Mr. ADAMS has risen higher in the scale of humanity, has ceased to be a partisan, and is the glorious recognized as the friend of the race. ## ROSABEL OF ROSS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON.

[PART TWO—(Continued.)

The party stopped at the sight, and Sir Gilbert, with a shudder, stood one side to let him pass, and, at the same time, drew his mantle round his face, lest he should be recognized. The poor man did not see them till he was within a few yards of where they stood; and when he did become aware of their presence, he stopped and seemed to hesitate whether he should not turn back, but Master Richard advancing with well-feigned compassion, if not, perhaps, with real pity, took him by the hand. "Why, Master Medlicot," said he, "I am sorry to see you looking so ill, man."

The unfortunate clothier looked wistfully in his face, and, after an ineffectual attempt at acknowledging his kindness, burst into tears.

"Come, come, man," said the steward, "you are too lonely here; come to me by and by, and we will have a cup of wine together, and then we can arrange what is best to be done to bring your enemy to justice; I tell you, man you have friends that will not see you wronged."

"Oh, Master Richard, I have no heart to taste anything," said the poor man, in a voice sadly broken and hoarse from agitation, "I had just walked down to the river side to be out of the way of the noise and the crowd," he continued, "for my own house is but lonely to-day, and not very comfortable to sit in; and you see, Master Richard," glancing down at his wet and dripping garments, "my luck is pretty full from the river, and—and—but I got out safe," he cried with a sudden wildness of manner; "I got out safe, thanks be to God, for I saw my error in time—I saw the sin of it, Master Richard! Oh, it would be a most frightful death, and a dreadful thing for any man to take upon himself to do." The wildness of the unfortunate man's eye now told too plainly under what impulse he had entered the water. "Not," he continued with his characteristic vanity, which still clung to him amid all his despair—"not that I fear death in a good cause, for I would peril my body as freely as any man in time of need, as against the Irish enemy, kerns, redshanks, or the like.

"I doubt it not, Master Medlicot, I doubt it not; but I would now advise that you should go home and get to bed, for you will need the use of all your limbs to-morrow, as your enemy, I hear, will demand the wager of battle."

Pale as poor Master Medlicot had been before, he grew much paler at this startling piece of intelligence, but it had the effect of recalling, in great measure, his wandering and distracted thoughts. "You cannot surely say so?" he exclaimed, "the villain is a priest, and I—I thought no priest could carry arms."

"True," replied the steward, whose object it was to exhibit the whole hardship of the case—"true, Master Medlicot, but ecclesiastics, as you are aware, possess the right of doing battle by their champions or proxies."

"It is a erying shame! I will appeal to his Holiness!" cried the distracted clothier. "I am an old man, I am not the man I was; what chance have I against a professed swordsman?"

"You have right upon your side at least, Master Medlicot," replied the steward; "but come, cheer up, man! You have friends on your side too, I say, who will not see you wronged."

"May God reward you, Master Richard," said the poor man. "I do believe that my townsmen wish me well. I have lived in Ross now, man and boy, for forty years and better, and it never was said of me that I had the ill-will of any man, till they that it least became deceived me and betrayed me to scorn; but I will not endure it, no, by St. Giles, I am not the man to be dishooored by priest or layman with impunity! He shall smart for it, I say his flock shall be stripped of him, and his lecentious ways shall be exposed! And as for her—"

"Nay, Master Medlicot, do not make either knave or wanton of so much importance as to lose your temper on their account."

"But, sir, he has wronged me; wronged me in the tenderest point of my honor. Ah! by St. Giles, were he a layman, that a man might say to him, 'sir, take your weapon and 'defend yourself,' I would not now be waiting to have justice done me by prior or by pope!" So saying and plucking up some little remnant of courage from his scorn bravado, poor Master Medlicot departed with a firmer step than could have been expected from the miserable appearance he had made so short a time before.

Sir Gilbert had not waited to hear the conversation out. Turning away, as if he could bear no more when he heard of the criminal's threatened appeal to arms, he had proceeded with Nickol through the postern, and when he overtook by Master Richard was already at the door of his chamber.

The knight, muffled as he was, set down and began a letter to his brother, but his hand shook so from excitement that he could not proceed. He cast off his cloak and hat, and loosened the collar of his jerkin, but still his agitation continued. The steward and his confederate stook by, awaiting his command; their presence only added to his ill-suppressed torture. "I cannot write!" he exclaimed, "shut here," pulling a ring from his finger, and handing it to Nickol, "take this to my brothers in Waterford; you will find them at their galleys opposite the tower; and when you have shown them the token, tell them, as they would not see their father's son dishonored, to come to me without delay. I will expect them at the chapel of Ross-betwen an hour after sunset; if I be not there when they arrive, let them wait till I join the rendezvous. Off, sirrah! ply whip and spur! it is for life or death you ride—here's gold to bear your charges—away!"

"If it please your nobleness," said Nickol, "I know a trusty messenger who will do the errand in half the time it would take me, who am an old man, and stiff from one long journey to-day already."

"Go or send; I care not, so my errand is done; but hark ye, sirrah, if my secret be breathed in mortal ears but those of your messenger and of my brothers, your next journey shall be to the gates of hell! Away!—and do you, Richard, remain; I would speak with you."

He started up, and following Nickol to the door, he locked and bolted it behind him, then threw himself on a seat, and motioned to the steward to sit down. "Richard," he said, after a pause, "you have served us long and faithfully!"

"I have done my best, Sir Gilbert; for I have served a good master."

"Richard, you have known us all since we were children."

"I have nursed your nobleness on this knee when you were an infant."

"My mother was an honest woman."

"I would fain say the man that would dare to say otherwise."

"Richard, you hinted a thing to-day—"

"As God is my judge, Sir Gilbert, I never in thought or word imputed aught but virtue to my honored mistress."

"But, sir, I spoke not of my revered mother. It was of my own rights, sir, I spoke; you said as much to-day that this Edmund in the priest was coming between me and my rights, sir—between me and my rights! what did you mean? I insist upon an answer—I say, sir, what you would mean by telling me that he was coming between me and my rights?" He spoke rapidly, and rising as he concluded, he confronted the steward with a countenance of imperious fierceness that made Master Richard, amidst all the secret exultation of successful machinations, turn pale before him, and tremble where he sat.

"As God is my judge," he began in depreating accents, but Sir Gilbert repeated his question with increased vehemence. The villain almost thought his own success. "Oh, noble sir," he exclaimed, "I never thought to have had this harshness at your hands; God knows I have not deserved it. I have toiled for you, and worked hard for you and yours for thirty years, and never till to-day I had reproach or anger from one of the name; do not, for a hasty word, spoken in my zeal for your own service—"

"Go or send; I care not, so my errand is done; but hark ye, sirrah, if my secret be breathed in mortal ears but those of your messenger and of my brothers, your next journey shall be to the gates of hell! Away!—and do you, Richard, remain; I would speak with you."

"As God is my judge," he began in depreating accents, but Sir Gilbert half-hour and was sitting in the garden, with all the doors bolted, when you came."

"There is a dear child!" said Nickol, well pleased with his daughter's anxiety to welcome him home. "But, Judith, I cannot wait now to tell you the news from your cousins, for this gentleman and I have some private affairs to talk over, and must take a turn in the garden, where we'll be least liable to interruption."

"Cannot you give the gentleman a seat here, father, and I will return to my work in the garden, out of your way?" said Judith, setting a chair before the comfortable fire, and dusting it with her apron, for the stranger.

"Thanks, my pretty maiden," said Master Richard; "but we will not interrupt your culinary concerns."

"No interruption whatever, I assure you, sir," replied Judith, again anxiously proffering a seat; but her father by this time had advanced to the garden-door, and Judith locked and only increased his determination to adjourn thither. "Stay, father," said Judith, when she heard him shaking at the latch, "stay, I have forgotten the key on my window-sill;" and running into the back apartment, she was heard to throw open the casement, after which returning with the key, she advanced to unlock the door.

"What ails the child?" cried Nickol, as she withdrew and reinserted the key somewhat rudely, which he had just overheard. Exclamations of indignation and amazement were, however, all that the inquiries of Macdillpatrick could for some time elicit from the astonished interpreter; "Villany of all sorts, tierna!" he would cry as the power to his chief's repeated interrogations; "villany upon the head of villainy! As I live by bread, tierna, I scarce know how to begin for, of all the knaves of the world ever saw, these two are the foremost, and of all the plots that ever were laid in the world, this scheme of theirs is the blackest and the hatefullest."

"Hy your hand, then, tell me what it is at once," cried the impatient chieftain; "if they be the knaves you say, are we not still in time to follow and cut their throats?"

"I was thinking the same, tierna, as I lay smothering the anger within me at what I heard," replied Donnell; "but my own colleen dhas is the daughter of my own, and I don't know what to do—ah! if it had not been for your sake, my sweetheart of the world, 'tis little mind I would have given the rogues for consultation!"

"I wish you had told me, Donnell," exclaimed the chief; "we could have laid them by the heels here without so much as showing our hands, and we'll be at our hand, and we could have stuffed their mouths with their own mantles, But tell me at once what villainy it is, they are brewing, and let us then set to work to prevent it, if we can."

"If it please your nobleness, there is one thing which I wish you could promise me," said Donnell hesitating, as he glanced from the face of his interrogator to the window of Judith's chamber, "that the father is a knave and a churl, it is no lie, but the colleen herself is so tender and kindly that it goes sorely against my will to bring her people into trouble. Would you promise, tierna, if I tell you the plot that the two were laying, not to make it deadly with the floor bedhagh Nickol ?"

DENOMINATIONAL EDUCATION.

One man may steal a horse where another may not look over a hedge. When Catholics say that they wish their children to be taught in their own faith, and that they believe this can be best done in Catholic schools, they are accused of being narrow-minded bigots, want to hand the education over to Cardinal Cullen, and so forth. But when the Protestant opponents of denominational education meet they may lay down for themselves exactly the converse of the Catholic principle, but there is of course no bigotry in them. On Thursday evening there was an Educational Conference at the Protestant Hall. We think we may venture safely to say that there was not a man upon the platform who had not more than once joined in resolutions condemnatory of denominational education. Yet in a report read by the Rev. Mr. Gregg, we find the following fundamental principles laid down:

"The principles upon which they thought all the members of the Church in the Union of Ork, without one single exception, might fairly agree were these: That the children of members of the Church should be instructed in the Holy Scriptures and in the formularies of the Church, and that it was desirable that the teachers of such children should be members of the Church of Ireland."

What is this but denominational education—for one side at least? The Rev. Mr. Silvester, one of the leading speakers, proceeded to point out the evil of mixed education thus:

"He thought it would be very wise to impose on every one's mind in connection with Protestant children from the eminent danger they were placed in when they went elsewhere for the purposes of education. He contended that in every parish where there were Protestant children there should be a school, and the object of the School was that it should be a focus provided for that end, so as to prevent the ingress of the enemy—he need not mention who the enemy was—but thousands of the lambs had strayed away from the fold, and were at the present moment in the utmost danger of being lost to the Church. The result of that would be that in the next generation they would have a fold but no flocks. There were fifty or sixty parishes in the county of Cork in which the number of Protestant children varied from six to fifteen, and these children were scattered over very large areas, and were obliged to mix with Roman Catholic children."

But though Mr. Sherrard thus deplored the evils of the system from the point of view of the Protestant, it is not to be supposed he considered mixed education by name. Oh, no, that would be adding the Catholics in getting rid of the oppression and restrictions of which they complain. It is terrible that Protestant children should be in peril of losing their faith by being placed in schools where Catholics are in the majority and the teachers are Catholics; but to reverse the case, and compel Catholic children to go where there is a Protestant majority and be taught by Protestant governesses, is not objectional in his mind at all. These are examples of the spirit which animates nearly the whole of the speakers at the meeting, the hunting idea apparently being that one seven hundred Protestant children throughout the county in Catholic or mixed schools would be proselytized. Now it might be supposed that there was a very simple remedy for this state of things in merely providing that the funds which the State grants for the education of the poor should be fairly allocated to the denominations. But that idea never entered the Conference at the Protestant Hall. Why? The thing is simple—it would be justice. The gentlemen of the Education Conference do not wish for a state of things in which each sects should have equal rights. They want exclusive and uncontrolled religious education for Protestants, but they cannot bear to it accorded to Catholics. They prefer to keep many of their own subjects in having Catholics aided by the State in a system such as they abhor, to be desirable for themselves. They have their own public schools, and a hundred children, on the condition that they profess no belief whatever, are to receive Catholic education. Such is the Education Act should be enacted so as to leave Catholics no option. Catholics have not grudged one single privilege they ask themselves, but they refuse privileges sometimes in the plainest, what they have granted which prospects well, but they have not yet struck the main channel of public duty they are running. We understand, however, that the Enterprise has paid expenses all along, and the yield at no doubt be largely increased when it shall reach the main channel, which is known to run along under the ridge which they are washing.

The Grass Valley Union says: The Idaho continues in its great prosperity. Last week a six days' run with thirty-five stamps gave a clean up of $26,000. Some new diggings on Granite Rondo river, in Union county, Oregon, are yielding from $10 to $20 per day to the hand. Piping and sluicing with great results. A party of ten boxes in the upper end of the first flume was partially cleaned up, after having run seven days, and $315 was secured. The day following one box more was cleaned up, and $205 was secured. Crane thinks he will get $100,000.

MINING SUMMARY.

The annexed mining items are gathered from our interior exchanges:

CALAVERAS.

We gather the following items from the Calaveras Chronicle of Saturday:

The Gopher Hill mine, which started a few years ago under very favorable circumstances, has collapsed.

The Good Hope mine continues to sink below the 130 foot level, and finds the vein of good size and containing some excellent ore.

The Daily Varden has fair ore on the dump. The mine is in good twice.

S. Hankins is opening a handsome vein near Skull Flat.

LASSEN.

The Lassen (Sunsanville) Advocate of Saturday contains the following items:

Mr. Hamilton has returned from the immediate vicinity of Susanville there is an extensive bed of extensive rich bonanza iron ore. The ore is identical with that in the famous Iron Mountain of Missouri, and will probably yield from 50 to 60 per cent. odiron.

Last week the Diamond Mountain Company made some progress towards prospecting the big gravel bed. They succeeded in sinking a shaft through the gravel, when they obtained a splendid prospect of coarse gold. Many of the lumps picked up from the ledge weighed from one to two dollars each.

NEVADA COUNTY.

The Nevada Transcript of the 20th says: The Enterprise gravel mine is located at Rough and Ready Island, and works are very complete. They have a ten-stamp battery, pumping and hoisting works all in the most complete order. The incline is in three compartments, and is down 1,400 feet. All the water above the bottom of the incline they have gravel which prospects well, but they have not yet struck the main channel they are running. We understand, however, that the Enterprise has paid expenses all along, and the yield at no doubt be largely increased when they reach the main channel, which is known to run along under the ridge which they are washing.

MISCELLANEOUS.

OUR COFFEE DEPARTMENT

OFFERS MANY ATTRACTIONS TO LOVERS of this article in its good old fashioned, rich, aromatic state. In purchasing, we always select the best delivered berries, and having the most improved Roasting and Grinding Machinery, in charge of experienced hands, right on our own premises, we turn out fresh grade bounty, and cannot fail to give the utmost satisfaction.

To procure, keep and make good Coffee is an important question with every good housekeeper. The laborious and uncertain method of roasting it by hand is, in these progressive days of machinery, generally abandoned—inasmuch as the machinery does it much better, and saves a world of trouble. The greatest difficulty seems to be that even the best article of pure Coffee, after being roasted and ground, rapidly loses its aroma, grows flat, and becomes unpalatable.

To avoid this, we have introduced a new method of packing Coffee by putting it in TIN CANS immediately after roasting and grinding it, before losing any aroma or strength.

The cans are fitted with three covers, which can be removed and replaced at pleasure, as often as more is wanted, so that the last ounce will prove as good as the first. Prepackaged Coffee in so very volatile, that packed in ordinary paper bags, or even with the utmost care in full paper, its strength and aroma will evaporate, and unless immediately used, the Coffee becomes stale, flat and unpalatable; while Coffee packed in our cans will be seen to any customers at any distance, and keep for years precisely as fresh, strong and nice as the day on which it was roasted.

Our Government Java, Mocaca, or 3-B. cans, $1.

Progress of the Apostleship of Prayer in the United States.

Rosary of the Apostleship, as Established at St. Matthew's Church, Washington, D. C.

(From the Messenger of the Sacred Heart of Jesus.)

About two years ago the pastor of St. Matthew's Church explained to his people the object of the Apostleship of Prayer, and to give it an external form, by which the members might be brought together, and by devotional exercises in common, cooperate in the great work of prayer in union with the Sacred Heart of Jesus, he affiliated it with the Society of the Living Rosary. At the time mentioned, this society counted only four or five circles; but they have steadily increased, and now they number fifty-six bands, a good proportion of which are composed of men.

The Rosary of the Apostleship meets on the first Sunday of the month, immediately after vespers, and the exercises on that occasion are well calculated to arrest the attention and kindle the piety of the faithful. The following order is observed:

1. After a hymn in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary, sung by the choir of the Apostleship, the director calls up in succession the heads of the different bands, to receive from the secretary the rosary tickets or mysteries for the month, which they distribute to the members of their respective bands. At the same time each head of a circle takes his or her banner, displaying on one side the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and on the other the Sacred Heart of Mary, on the top of which is inscribed in large figures the number of the band, so that all who belong to any particular band may know where to station themselves during the exercises.

2. After the mysteries are distributed, the director announces the general intention to be prayed for during the month, and makes some observations, if he thinks proper, on the importance of the subject.

3. Then comes the announcement of the particular intention which the members of the society wish to have recommended to the prayers of the Apostleship. These intentions are commonly so numerous that it is necessary to classify them, and to present them to the Lord in different bands. These bands mentioned in the Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

4. After this the director reads from that monthly publication an account of the more prominent favors obtained through the prayers of the Apostleship, and almost every month he has the consolation to report favors, temporal and spiritual, obtained within the limits of the society.

5. The following act of consecration to the Sacred Heart is now recited, with a prayer of reparation and thanksgiving.

6. Then follows a hymn to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, during which a collection is taken up to pay the expenses of the association, and to aid in the decoration of the sanctuary.

7. After this the director makes such remarks as circumstances may call for, and then is recited in common the third part of the rosary, which is followed by prayers for the faithful departed, and particularly for the deceased members of the society. Another hymn by the choir closes the exercises in the Heart of Jesus surmounted by a cross in flames of love, and encircled by the crown of thorns. On the reverse is the garland of victory inclosing a suitable larger plaque.

The fervor that has grown out of this zealous work of Father Didier, and the rapidity with which this devotion has taken growth in his parish, encourages us in believing that other congregations knowing these happy results, may be led to imitate the pious work organized at St. Matthew's church, Washington, and at St. Vincent's, Baltimore.

As an inducement to all to spare no labor in promoting this devotion, and in testimony of the readiness of our saintly Pius to encourage it under every form which the work of the Apostleship assumes, we subjoin the result of a petition made by Rev. Father Ramiere, the Director-General of the Apostleship.

The confraternity of the Papal Zouaves has been very generally established in houses of education, its members being enrolled from those pupils who belong to the Apostleship of Prayer. With spiritual arms united to their age, especially by frequent communion and unremitting application to the duties daily assigned them, these young Zouaves seek to defend the Holy See against its enemies. Thus among those sons and children, love toward the persecuted Church and devotion to the Holy See are invigorated, and the young scholars are prepared to fight one day with other arms against the sacrilegious spoilers of St. Peter's patrimony.

To foster this special form of the Apostleship of Prayer, Father Ramiere presented to the Holy Father the following petition

I.—A special blessing for the decorations or insignia which teachers distribute to their pupils in reward for extra acts of piety, and which, according to the rules, are exacted that, so often as the decorations are conferred, the recipients pledge themselves ever to protect the rights of the Holy See, and never to join the secret societies condemned by the Church.

Second—That those who are decorated may have all the privilege of gaining, every day they receive the honor and at the hour of death, a plenary indulgence, to be imparted to them by their own confessor. Moreover, that those who, for having persevered in the fear and of their sacred duties of the Papal militia, may have received the highest decoration, may be allowed to communicate these two indulgences to their parents.

Third—That all members may gain a plenary indulgence on the day of their reception into, and on the following festivals: Chair of St. Peter at Rome (January 18th,) St. Leo, P. (April 10th) Our Lady, Help of Christians (May 24th), and SS. Peter and Paul (June 29th.)

Fourth—That for joining the above indulgences, membership in the Apostleship of Prayer, joined to the practice of this peculiar devotion, by enrollment or affiliation is needed; so that in all seminaries where the Apostleship exists, the centre locality of the Papal Zouaves may be established.

To an audience granted on the 21st day of April, 1870, our most Holy Lord, Pius IX, by Divine Providence, Supreme Pontiff, in answer to the petitions presented by the undersigned, Cardinal Prefect of a Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, graciously to grant all and singular. To the first, according to the terms of the request; to the second, affirmatively, the usual conditions being observed; to the third, granting the plenary indulgence at the hour of death, it is enjoined that the dying person, duly disposed, in his hearts, if speech fails him, the most loving invocation of the sacred name of Jesus; affirmatively, the usual conditions being observed; to the fourth, affirmatively, all things quoad its members every month, or an average, to about nine thousand.

During the exercises above mentioned, a large picture of the Sacred Heart of Jesus is exhibited, mounted on a high and handsomely ornamented stand, to excite the devotion of the faithful. In the life of Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque is mentioned the promise of our Lord: "I will enrich with special graces and benedictions any community or congregation in which a picture of my heart will be exposed for public veneration." It is needless, then, after the exhibition of this picture in the Rosary of the Apostleship at St. Matthew's, the circles have rapidly increased, and the devotion to the Sacred Heart been more greatly diffused.

The members of this Association wear, at least at the time of the monthly meeting, a silver medal, on one side of which is represented the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and on the reverse our Lord appearing to Blessed Margaret Mary. This medal is mounted on the superhumeral cross that flow from the Heart of Jesus, and of the same kind as being united to it to render our prayers efficacious.

A similar association has been established in St. Aloysius' parish, and meets on the third Sunday of the month. Father Lynch, of Georgan College, is the spiritual director.

ST. VINCENT'S CHURCH, BALTIMORE—THE CORALITY OF THE SACRED HEART.

In St. Vincent's parish is established the Apostleship of Prayer, under the guidance of the zealous pastor, Rev. Edmund Didier, who assumed a different but not less fruitful and beautiful form of development. In this parish the Apostleship of Prayer numbers nine hundred and fifty members. Out of this number a Sodality of the Sacred Heart, with a membership of three hundred and fifty, has been formed. Its meetings are held every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, when the sodalists spend an hour with the Sacred Heart in prayer, recitation of the Little Office, Stations of the Cross, arranging the communion of atonement for the week and in other devotional exercises. The object of the Sodality, as of the living rosary, is to form an expression to the worship of the Apostleship of Prayer, to enable the associates to realize better that strength in prayer which their union gives, and to enliven their faith in the dogma of common devotional exercises. The pastor, Rev. Edmund Didier, is spiritual director of the sodality, and is assisted in his government by a board of officers and by twelve counselors. A choir of fifteen members, under the directions of an accomplished organist, with devotional music, contributes greatly to the pious fervor of the weekly meetings.

On Sunday, April 27th, during vespers, two hundred members were admitted into this sodality by the Rev. Director-General, for the United States, of the Apostleship of Prayer. He blessed and distributed to the new members the cherry-colored ribbons and silver medals that constitute the badge of membership, and after this ceremony addressed a few words on their obligations and on the blessings they might hope for. At the conclusion of the discourse the sodality joined sang a very devotional hymn in honor of the Sacred Heart, and during the benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, which followed, the act of consecration to the divine Heart was read by Father Didier in the name of the sodalists.

The medals, struck from a die made in Baltimore expressly for the sodality, are beautiful and of elegant workmanship. The material is solid silver; on the obverse is the Sacred Heart of Jesus, surrounded by a crown of thorns, and encircled by the garland of victory inclosing a suitable larger plaque.

The fervor that has grown out of this zealous work of Father Didier, and the rapidity with which this devotion has taken growth in his parish, encourages us in believing that other congregations knowing these happy results, may be led to imitate the pious work organized at St. Matthew's church, Washington, and at St. Vincent's, Baltimore.

AGRICULTURAL NOTES.

The Gilroy Advocate says the most reliable information obtainable warrants the assertion that a much larger yield will be had throughout the valley, and in many localities far above an average.

A Lockeford correspondent thus writes to the Calaveras Chronicle: "Nothing but harvesting and crop is talked among the farmers. The wheat crop is good and heavy. Oats have all commenced in earnest, the yield of small grain in this vicinity can now be very accurately estimated. The area cut thus far for threshing is estimated at three fourths of a crop.

The Placer Herald is informed from the best authority that the harvest of small grain in the western part of Placer, this year, will average, in the lowest estimate, about fifteen bushels to the acre. It adds: "In every county in the State has done as much or more than Placer in the matter of the size of marbles and others the size of an orange. On breaking the quartz, the centers of the nodules have been found to be of brilliant galena ore, so lustrous as to almost reflect the image of objects placed before it. North and South the deposits of clay and ore-bearing rocks are very rare, and only occur in peculiar localities, rendering this that in which this mine is situated."

The Career of a Great Remedy.

Twenty Summers have elapsed since it was briefly announced that a new vegetable tonic and alterative, bearing the name of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, had been added to the list of proprietary medicines and medicines. The modest announcement which invited attention to the proposition, stated that it had been used with great success in private practice as a cure for dyspepsia, bilious complaints, constipation and intermittent fever. It was also claimed that the new article possessed extraordinary properties. The proprietor, of every class, invited its use, and asked that its merit, correctness and corrective, and should it not prove as represented, that the purchase money be refunded. From that time to the present the demand has been upward and onward, and it stands to-day at the head of all medicines of its class, whether foreign or domestic. In the magnitude of its sales as well as reputation for purity, strength and positive usefulness, it stands unrivaled in the Pacific coast. They have been prominent characteristics of the disease during the past few months. It is absolutely infallible. Indigestion, bilious disorders, constipation, intermittent, remittent fevers, and all the ordinary complaints generated by a vitiated and turbid atmosphere, vanish under the restoring and regulating influence of this great vegetable corrective. Its use for a few days will satisfy any one's mind of a truth of a truth of a century, and such among the names of thousands of well known citizens who are testifying to every class and calling. In Europe it is thought a great thing to obtain the patronage of royalty for a patent medicine; but Hostetter's Bitters has been spontaneously adopted by millions of the intelligent sovereigns, and its patent rests in their subservience.

Progress of the Apostleship of Prayer in the United States.

Rosary of the Apostleship, as Established at St. Matthew's Church, Washington, D. C.

(From the Messenger of the Sacred Heart of Jesus

About two years ago the pastor of St. Matthew's Church explained to his people the object of the Apostleship of Prayer, and to give it an external form, by which the members might be brought together, and by devotional exercises in common, cooperate in the great work of prayer in union with the Sacred Heart of Jesus, be affiliated it with the Society of the Living Rosary. At the time mentioned, the society counted only four or five circles; but they have steadily increased, and now they number fifty-six bands, a good portion of which are composed of men.

The Rosary of the Apostleship meets on the first Sunday of the month, immediately after vespers, and the exercises on that occasion are well calculated to attract the attention and kindle the piety of the faithful. The following order is observed:

1. After a hymn in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary, sung by the choir of the Apostleship, the director calls up in succession the heads of the different bands, to receive from the secretary the rosary tickets or mysteries for the month, which they distribute to the members of their respective bands. At the same time each head of a circle takes his or her banner, displaying on one side the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and on the other the Sacred Heart of Mary, on the top of which is inscribed in large figures the number of the band, so that all who belong to any particular band may know where to station themselves during the exercises.

2. After the mysteries are distributed, the director announces the general intention to be prayed for during the month, and makes some observations, if he thinks proper, upon the importance of the subject.

3. These comes the announcement of the particular intentions which the members of the society wish to have recommended to the prayers of the Apostleship. These intentions are commonly so numerous that it is necessary to classify them, and to present them to the meeting under the five different heads mentioned in the Messenger of the Sacred Heart.

4. After this the director reads from the monthly publication an account of the more prominent favors obtained through the prayers of the Apostleship, and almost every month he has the consolation to report various other favors, temporal and spiritual, obtained within the limits of the society.

5. The following act of consecration to the Sacred Heart is now recited, with a prayer of supplication and thanksgiving.

6. The fathers a hymn to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, during which a collection is taken up to pay the expenses of the association, and to aid in the decoration of the sanctuary.

7. After this the director makes such remarks as circumstances may call for, and then is recited in common the third part of the rosary, which is followed by prayers for the faithful departed, and particularly for the deceased members of the society. Another hymn by the choir closes the exercises of the meeting.

Connected with this society is what is termed the "Treasury of the Sacred Heart." By this is meant the number or aggregate of good works performed by the society every month in honor of the Sacred Heart, and for the intentions of the Apostleship. These works of charity or piety are marked on the tickets which the members receive on the first Sunday, and at the meeting of the following month these tickets are deposited in a silver-plated basket which hangs near the shrine of the Blessed Virgin. These good works amount every month, or an average, to about nine thousand.

During the exercises above mentioned, a large picture of the Sacred Heart of Jesus is exhibited, mounted on a high and handsomely ornamented stand, to excite the devotion of the faithful. In the life of Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque is mentioned this promise of our Lord: "I will enrich with especial graces and benedictions any community or congregation where the picture of my heart will be exposed for public veneration." It is certain that, since the exhibition of this picture in the Rosary of the Apostleship at St. Matthew's, the devotion have rapidly increased, and the devotion to the Sacred Heart been more greatly diffused.

The members of this Association wear, at least at the time of the monthly meeting, a silver medal, on one side of which is represented the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and on the other the Sacred Heart of Mary, on the top of which is inscribed in large figures the number of the band, so that all who belong to any particular band may know where to station themselves during the exercises.

2. After the mysteries are distributed, the director announces the general intention to be prayed for during the month, and makes some observations, if he thinks proper, upon the importance of the subject.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

IRELAND.

Home Government Association.

At a meeting of the Home Government Association held in Dublin on the 22d June, Mr. Blunden moved—"That the continuance in the country of a code of coercion, unparalleled in the severity of its enactments, was a proof that the system established at the Union had failed to secure order, freedom and good government."

He stated that Ireland was still opposed to English rule. He considered some of the provisions of the Coercion Act, and the character of them as barbarous. By the 111 power was given to peg the press. He would have to travel back to the time of the Conqueror and his curfew law to find a parallel for it. A more arbitrary and unconstitutional law could not be framed. In England the Habeas Corpus protected the subject; but in Ireland that law had been suspended at the lowest possible nine of the Union. He ignored the opinion of Earl Grey against Coercion Acts. He believed that coercion laws had an evil effect on the morals of a people and rendered them lowspirited and helpless. Despotic legislation would not succeed with a high spirited nation. Once for all, he said, such laws favored discontent. The spirit of nationality permeated the air, and, no matter what foreigner came among them to live, his descendants became nationalists. In rage or in broadcloth Ireland's people would not live in chains. The country was contented to accept Independence without separation, and he believed that would be a judicious arrangement.

The Rev. Dr. Galbraith seconded the resolution. The continued application of coercion to this country was useless and degrading. Mr. Gladstone spoke of Naples, of Lord Aberdeen about the state of Naples, stated that force, not affect-n, was the foundation of the law, and was consequently all laws became odious. He read an extract from Mr. Gladstone's letter, to show that he considered the searching for arms in Naples was a very great grievance. Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Galbraith said, was then young, and he sympathized with the state of the Neapolitan parties, and he (Mr. Galbraith) was not satisfied with the condition of his country. Mr. Gladstone stated in 1846 that there were no more loyal people than the Irish, and he knew them, for he had been among them and yet, in 1870 he passed a Coercion Act. Many a Russell and many a Palmerston would look on the Irish before the Irish people before they would consent to perpetual robbery.

The Rev. W. G. Carroll addressed the meeting from the chair, I beg you join the resolution from the chair, I beg to say a word in support of it. Fired with indignation as we all must have been, at listening to Mr. Blunden's recital of the laws under which we live and move and have our being, there is one thing that would fire us more, and that is to see an instance of the operation of detestable enactments. He once saw such an instance, and it was this: About eighteen months ago he was traveling on the Great Southern and Western Railway, and in the same carriage there was a good looking young country man handcuffed, and two policemen armed to the teeth guarding the prisoner. He asked one of the policemen what the prisoner had done. "Nothing, sir," was the answer. "Had he been tried?" "Tenant's warrant from his own freeholds and from his young wife and two little children in Athy jail." "And what are you going to do with him?" "Going to leave him in Athy jail." "And how long will he be there?" "Looking at the Lord Lieutenant like." "And what is to become of his wife and children in the meantime?" was the answer—"God knows." Now, I ask you, what can that man and his wife and children and all his brothers think of English law? What can I think of it? What could all of us think and say on the platform at Athy think of it? What do you think of it? The Pall Mall Gazette this morning has one of its witty articles on what the Irish have to learn from his visit to England. It points out with great irony how the great social and private life of London can teach Irishmen morality, morality and a great many other social virtues; and the writer might have added that other parts of London could give the Irish lessons in the noble arts of wife beating and womensmashing; and that even the sedate and amiable city of Dublin could show his Majesty how they manage popular elections. Now, we in Ireland could not enjoy any of these things. We are simple people, and our education has been neglected in these departments of civilization, but there is one thing we could show the Shah—and we could show him that better than Siberia, or the Pyramids—and that is how a people such as Mr. Gladstone has described us can be oppressed and degraded under a brutalising legislation. If the Eastern monarch were to come and see how this might be done in the case of tyranny and pretended civilization, no doubt he would go back to Teheran eager to his missions that he had not understood his business before, but that he had learned how to do it, how to subject a free England to treatment of the wretched Irish, and that, by the foot of Mahomet, verily henceforth and "in his little finger would be thicker than the loins of his forebears."

The Coercion Act.

Loughlinsholin, in the county of Londonderry, Ireland, is now in the enjoyment of the full realization of the constitutional advantages which the Peace Preservation Act confers upon that portion of the United Kingdom. Why the people of Loughlinsholin should have been so favored is more than the Irish newspapers, in which the interesting event is recorded, seem to know. It is, however, to be presumed that Dublin Castle is the source, and the hap pas Loughlinsholiners must be satisfied. Let us Londoners realize to ourselves the present condition of our fellow-subjects who have had the ill-luck to be born in Loughlinsholin. Should an Irishman in Loughlinsholin be discovered carrying, without license, anything in the shape of a firearm or even part of a firearm, or anything approaching in resemblance to a sword, cutlass, pike, bayonet, bullet, gunpowder or ammunition, the wretched man may be seized by anybody and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, with the brutal accompaniment of what is called hard labor, and that is very severe, the association during that period of the worse criminals. Should any shopkeeper of Loughlinsholin sell gunpowder, without seeing the buyer's license and indorsing on it the circumstances of the sale, he can be fined, should any gunsmith make, mend or keep the gun of an unlicensed person he runs the risk of being fined £50. Just imagine all the inhabitants of London being subjected to such rigorous measures as these, should the people of Ireland be constantly assuming, when the order of the day for agitation, to become law by the easy process of being introduced by us as foreigners, and to be landed upon by us as foreigners, and to pass into Ammunition, the giant fabric of whose commercial wealth Irishmen have almost contributed to build up. Blessed, then, by the hands of the venerable patriot they were raised in the Catholic Church, should receive a new impulse in those days of total misgoverning, and that modern inventions should be made to yield facilities for carrying them out. The pilgrimages which have done so much to arouse faith and devotion in France, Belgium, Germany and Italy, will produce their fruit upon England also; and we are glad to learn that some of the nobles as well of the nobility among the Catholics of England belong to the committee, and are at the head of the good movement. Lord Walter Kerr is acting as Hon. Secretary.—London Tablet, June 28.

Native Church of the Sacred Heart.

We have before now mentioned the national subscription in France for the erection of a Votive Church to the Sacred Heart. This has now come before the Assembly; the Archbishop of Paris made the formal application for the legislature to grant 100,000 francs, which is now published. It is stated that the site selected is on the hill of Montmartre, the highest point of the city, and the martyrdom of the first apostles of France, and as an eminence which is visible from almost every part of the city. The Archbishop is careful to state that no compulsion will be brought to bear, but only demands legal power to buy the site on the grounds of public utility, and declares that the expense will not be great, and that, as the church is built, after he has left the world, the ownership may be left entirely to the Chapter of Montmartre, and the Archbishop of Paris. The bill drawn up by the Minister of Public Instruction and Public Worship is precisely in harmony with these proposals; and provides that the exact site shall be settled between the Archbishop and the Prefect of the Seine.—London Tablet, June 28.

Alsace Elections.

The first Parliamentary election in Alsace Lorraine since the annexation of the provinces to Germany took place on Sunday, in Strasburg; and the result constitutes a striking proof of the feelings of devoted love with which the people of that city regard their former connection with France. "The irreconcilable French and Citramontane party," says the correspondent of a Paris paper, "has carried the day by a vast majority." In fact, out of 14,421 electors inscribed on the lists, only 5,000 were not unnaturally swayed by the appeals of the Bishop and his clergy, so that 9,421 votes were given for the candidates of Monsieur A. Scheurer Kestner, the well known friend of true France, the honest, the courageous—who stands for absolute neutrality, and declaring that the liberty of religion and conscience was always respected by the Assembly, and was not in question. Two-thirds of the 5,000 votes polled for 261 votes. This vote was a decisive blow to the impious Revolution which has usurped the Government of France.—Westminster Gazette, June 28.

GERMANY.

Princes in Vienna.

The princes are flocking into Vienna. His Highness of Roumania, better known as the "carpet-bag prince," arrived there on Monday, and is treated as if he were the religion in France, used these words: "We should have pilgrimages much, remembering that we are all pilgrims on this earth." We are pleased to learn that in London also a pilgrimage has been formed to go out as a pilgrimage to Paray le Monial in honor of the Sacred Heart, which pilgrimage is to start in England in the beginning of September. It has the sanction of his grace the Archbishop of Westminster, and we understand that several of the English Bishops have given their approval to this act of devotion. It is quite natural that this latest ancient practice of devout pilgrimages, which has never for eighteen hundred years ceased in the Catholic Church, should receive a new impulse in those days of total misgoverning, and that modern inventions should be made to yield facilities for carrying them out. The pilgrimages which have done so much to arouse faith and devotion in France, Belgium, Germany and Italy, will produce their fruit upon England also; and we are glad to learn that some of the nobles as well of the nobility among the Catholics of England belong to the committee, and are at the head of the good movement. ### Pilgrimages in Italy, etc.

More than 200,000 pilgrims have resorted this year to the sanctuary at Oropa, and have all left it full of joy and peace and their courage as they did do their faith they would make short work of the Internet. It is not right for us to signal the fact that the Romans have proceeded against the Christians of the religious communities. The Shah, in conversation with the Nuncio at Brussels (Mgr. Cattani), stated that his primary object in visiting Europe was to fulfill the duty of offering his homage to the august chief of Christianity. Mgr. Cattani was in no way to be at fault of information for the noble character of Pius IX., especially for his calm courage with which he has defended himself against a host of enemies. In conclusion the shah promised Mgr. Cattani that he would protect the faithful in Persia, and would allow them the full liberty in the exercise of their religion. Humbert will go to Vienna towards the end of August. The Holy Father spoke on a late occasion against evil marriages, denouncing all such as an attempt to effect an alliance between the Church and the State. The audience are on the increase; the Society of Catholic Youths, the queen Isabella and her daughter, the princess Louise, have arrived as deputations from various assemblies to congratulate the Sovereign Pontiff on his fifty-seventh anniversary of his assuming the pontificate, have all been received affectionately by the Holy Father. The Pope has confirmed the daughter of the queen. A Papal brief continues the privileges of the religious orders in their functions. It is certain that in the next consistory there will be a formal denunciation of the law for the suppression of religious houses. Another ministerial crisis is the result of a motion, which is described as "favorable to the Government," given out Wednesday in the Palmerston Club.—Observer, June 28.

The Basle Election.

The contest at Basle, consequent on the succession of Lord Chelsea to the Earldom of Cadogan, has been enlivened by an episode which, although not of a kind to form a precedent, or become a general feature at elections. The Liberal candidate, Captain Hayner, not being present at the meeting of Government at the subject of education, a certain Mr. Cox, from the Midland Counties, was put forward, seemingly with the full consent of the leaders of the league. The Basle Liberals were not unnaturally shocked at so fanatical a proposal, and, when the show of hands was taken, only about a dozen or six hundred could be got to support the candidature of Bissaker. A poll was demanded, and then their voices rose in favor of the unfortunate French and Ultramontane representatives. This fact is significant, surely, put an end to the talk of those German sympathizers here and in England who have been saying that Alsace, especially Strasburg, being ethnologically French rather than French, would be disposed to accept the annexation.

In the French Assembly the debate on the question of the Civil Interments bill was crowded, the Ministers of Russia, Denmark, Austria and Turkey being present. The Irreligious Liberals are in a state of fury that the present Government proposes to put a pilgrimage to Paray le Monial in honor of the Sacred Heart, which pilgrimage is to start in England in the beginning of September. It has the sanction of his grace the Archbishop of Westminster, and we understand that several of the English Bishops have given their approval to this act of devotion. It is quite natural that this latest ancient practice of devout pilgrimages, which has never for eighteen hundred years ceased in the Catholic Church, should receive a new impulse in those days of total misgoverning, and that modern inventions should be made to yield facilities for carrying them out. The pilgrimages which have done so much to arouse faith and devotion in France, Belgium, Germany and Italy, will produce their fruit upon England also; and we are glad to learn that some of the nobles as well of the nobility among the Catholics of England belong to the committee, and are at the head of the good movement. Lord Walter Kerr is acting as Hon. Secretary.—London Tablet, June 28.

Native Church of the Sacred Heart.

We have before now mentioned the national subscription in France for the erection of a Votive Church to the Sacred Heart. This has now come before the Assembly; the Archbishop of Paris made the formal application for the legislature to grant 100,000 francs, which is now published. It is stated that the site selected is on the hill of Montmartre, the highest point of the city, and the martyrdom of the first apostles of France, and as an eminence which is visible from almost every part of the city. The Archbishop is careful to state that no compulsion will be brought to bear, but only demands legal power to buy the site on the grounds of public utility, and declares that the expense will not be great, and that, as the church is built, after he has left the world, the ownership may be left entirely to the Chapter of Montmartre, and the Archbishop of Paris. The bill drawn up by the Minister of Public Instruction and Public Worship is precisely in harmony with these proposals; and provides that the exact site shall be settled between the Archbishop and the Prefect of the Seine.—London Tablet, June 28.

Alsace Elections.

The first Parliamentary election in Alsace Lorraine since the annexation of the provinces to Germany took place on Sunday, in Strasburg; and the result constitutes a striking proof of the feelings of devoted love with which the people of that city regard their former connection with France. "The irreconcilable French and Citramontane party," says the correspondent of a Paris paper, "has carried the day by a vast majority." In fact, out of 14,421 electors inscribed on the lists, only 5,000 were not unnaturally swayed by the appeals of the Bishop and his clergy, so that 9,421 votes were given for the candidates of Monsieur A. Scheurer Kestner, the well known friend of true France, the honest, the courageous—who stands for absolute neutrality, and declaring that the liberty of religion and conscience was always respected by the Assembly, and was not in question. Two-thirds of the 5,000 votes polled for 261 votes. This vote was a decisive blow to the impious Revolution which has usurped the Government of France.—Westminster Gazette, June 28.

THE FUNERAL OF THE WIDOW'S SON.

Why are the bonfires and bonfires crowded?
Round the Lord's acre with their folds are they?
All the world's sons are assembled
And gathered, and this is his burial day.

She hoped he would lay the green turf over her,
And he promised he would, and he kept his word,
But he passed over a mound that covered another
And shielded the rest of her darling dear.

His wig was gone as the bald fountains
Along the dry paths of spring that lay;
His cane was a staff of feebleness
Like the dry halts of the lonely melancholy.

Round many a heart was the grief-pile welling,
Now a flood, now a pool of the tearing wave,
But the sons of Zion found that tender darling
Rolled mountains high, and they could not save.

In remembrance now over the dark morasses
Time tossed the cairns-turned hills of Mourne,
And the sons of Zion found that tender darling
Every thought's corpse to the eastern seat.

They have set corpse for the green hill slowly,
And way over his hearse treaded wide;
And the sons of Zion found that tender darling
And ran in fear as the beam of the moon was pale.

They have set corpse for the green hill slowly,
The spreading tongues of the elms among—
And the sons of Zion found that tender darling
Unheeded the wounded mourner's song.

And another among the boy they wended
When the last sad wave of the sea broke down,
And the beloved heard the sons of Zion
Of the power of sepulture in lone Arkeen.

Here above the bones of the rolling billow
Which tossed over the dead of the drowned,
Beneath the boughs of the weeping willow,
Where the sea-bird's wing is the only sound.

Here few will behold the whisker weeping
Where the sea-bird's wing is the only sound,
But the gorgeous flowers of summer peeping
Will look on the tomb of the mighty dead.

And the new will forget the longest prattle
Of the sea-bird's wing and the weeping song,
And how bravely he fought in the world's tough battle
Will be told by the sons of Zion long.

To shield her from want when his life was young,
And oft when the storm through the morning flowers
Shook the sycamore-rod on the eastern floor,
And when the straws through the morning flowers
Were the corner seats to the children's door.

And when she strays through the morning flowers
To the corner seats to the children's door,
Will she see the gleam of the western heaven
Through the tears that are in her eyes no more?

Will she see the gleam of the western heaven
Through the tears that are in her eyes no more?

June, 1873.—Sir Bernard moved—That the continuance in the country of a code of coercion, unparalleled in the severity of its enactments, was a proof that the system established at the Union had failed to secure order, freedom and good government.

He stated that Ireland was still opposed to English rule. He considered some of the provisions of the Coercion Act, and the practices of the Executive, as barbarous. By past experience in the province, he was convinced that the Coercion Act would have no effect on the morals of a people and rendered them hostile to all law. Repeal of legislative union would never succeed with a high-spirited nation, never succeed with a people who had once for all, he said, such laws forced upon them. The spirit of nationality pervaded the air, and, no matter what foreigner came among them to live, his descendants became nationalists. In rage or in broadcloth Ireland's people would not live in chains. The country was contented to accept independence without separation, and he believed that would be a judicious arrangement.

The Rev. Dr. Galbraith seconded the resolution. The continued application of coercion to this country was useless and degrading. Mr. Gladstone in 1851, writing to Lord Aberdeen about the state of Naples, stated that force, not affection, was the foundation of the law, and as a consequence all laws became odious. He read an extract from Mr. Gladstone's letter, to show that he considered the searching for arms in Naples was a very great grievance.

Gibbons.—Mr. Galbraith said, was then but young, and he sympath zed with the state of the Neapolitan patriots, and he (Mr. Galbraith) was much satisfied with the condition of his country. Mr. Gladstone stated in 1851 that there were no more loyal people than the Irish people then were, for he had been among them; yet, in 1870 he passed a Coercion Act. Many a Russell and many a Palmerston would tell the Government the Irish people desire they would consent to perpetual robbery.

The Rev. W. O. Carroll said—Sir, before you put the question from the chair, I beg to say a word in support of it. Fired with indignation as we all must have been, at the listening to Mr. Blunden's recital of the laws under which we live and more especially have our being, there is one thing that would fire us more, and that is to see an instance of the actual operation of detestable enactments. He once saw such an instance, and it was this: About eighteen months ago he was travelling on the Great Southern and Western Railway, and in the same carriage there was a good looking young country man handcuffed, and two policemen armed to the teeth guarding the prisoner. He asked one of the policemen what the prisoner had done. "Nothing, sir," was the reply. "Had he been tried?" "Indeed no, sir." "And what are you going to do with him?" "Going to leave him in Athy jail." "And how long will he be there?" "As long as the Lord Lieutenant likes." "And what is to become of his wife and children in the meantime?" Answer—"God knows." Now, I ask you, what can that man and his wife and children and his brothers think of English law? What can I think of it? What could all of us that stood on the platform at Athy think of it? What do you think of it? The Pall Mall Gazette the morning has one of its witty articles on what the Shah is to learn from his visit to England. It points out with great irony how the public speculator and private life of London can teach him female modesty, and a great many other social virtues, and the writer might have added that the poor of London could give the Shah lessons in the noble arts of wife-beating and woman-smashing; and then the wife-beater and maiden-slayer of Bath could show his Majesty how they manage popular elections. Now, we in Ireland could not supply any of these things. We are simple people, and our education has been neglected in these departments of civilization; but there is one thing we could show the Shah—and we could show him that better than Siberia, Poland or Algiers—and that is how a people such as Mr. Gladstone has described us can be oppressed and degraded under a brutalising legislation. If this Eastern monarch were to come and see how this might be done under the mask of hypocrisy and pseudo-civilization, no doubt he would go back to Teheran and say to his ministers that he had not understood the business before, but that he had learned how to treat his subjects from England's treatment of her wretched Irish, and that by the fist of Mahomet, verily henceforward "his little finger would be thicker than the loins of his forefathers."

The Coercion Act.

Loughinsholin, in the county of Londonderry, Ireland, is now in the enjoyment of the full realisation of the constitutional advantages which the Peace Preservation Act confers upon that portion of the United Kingdom. Why the people of Loughinsholin should have been so favored is more than the Irish newspapers, in which the interesting event is recorded, seem to know. It is, however, to be presumed that Dublin Castle is the scene, and the hap ess Loughinsholinites must be satisfied to be Londoners just realise to ourselves the present condition of our fellow-subjects who are had like ill-luck to be born in Loughinsholin. Should an inhabitant of Loughinsholin be discovered carrying, without license, anything in the shape of a firearm or even part of a firearm, or anything resembling a resemblance to a sword, cutlas, pike, bayonet, bullet, gunpowder or ammunition, the presumed man may be seized by anybody and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, with the brutal addition that he may be called hard labor, and, what is even worse, the association during that period of the worse culprits. Should any shopkeeper of Loughinsholin sell gunpowder, without seeing the buyer's license and indorsing on it the circumstances of the sale, he can be fined, should any gunsmith make, mend or keep the gun of an unlicensed person he runs the risk of being fined £50. Just imagine all the inhabitants of London being subjected to such restrictions as these as a punishment for having been found guilty of the crime of Irishry. Such is the Coercion Act.

the statements so frequently made, that the Catholic hierarchy were conspiring against the integrity of the Empire, and that was the cause of the oppressive laws enacted. The correspondent of the World declared that the Chancellor said he was much amused by the encouragement he received from English and American Protestants in his attacks on Catholicity. They, poor fools, thought his violence came from a desire to propagate the doctrines of the Reformation and, of course, for the sake of accomplishing this object they would applaud the most scandalous proceedings, whereas he was the enemy of every kind of Christianity, and consequently would not pluck all religion out by the roots, by stimulating these shocking revelations. Mr. Bok, of the press in this country, Mr. Bok, of the press in this country, O'Connor Don, Mr. Maguire, continue to encourage the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his work, and it is now almost an appeal to Catholic Ireland "at home," and to whose Catholic Ireland "at home," and to whose Catholic brethren abroad, in a fairest spots. The lecturer have elicited much applause during their delivery.—London Universe, June 28.

Pastoral of the Cardinal.

A pastoral has been issued by his Eminence Cardinal Cullen, addressed to the diocese of Dublin, in support of the Peter's Pence collection. After demonstrating the supremacy of the Church, the Cardinal quotes St. Columbanus, who said that in his day there was in Ireland no law, schismatic or heretic. Unhappily this assertion cannot now be made, but Ireland can boast that she has been more fortunate in preserving the faith, and less ravaged by heresy and infidelity than most other kingdoms. He then says: "What efforts are made to promote Atheism, Pantheism, Socialism, Communism, and every opinion hostile to religion and destructive of human society! A Protestant missionary bishop sends the inspiration and vitality of the Scriptures, while professors and writers of our own Catholic city reject the doctrine clearly laid down in the gospel—that the wicked would be punished with eternal punishment, because in their view, whilst not to be preferred to the gospel, that doctrine jars with the civilization of the nineteenth century. While errors of every kind are thus defended by public writers and lecturers, and propagated by the press, the Catholic Confession of faith is often thrust-dives under the guidance of the infallible authority of the Holy See, is appealing to the faithful of the diocese in support of the collection, his Eminence describes the sufferings of the Pope, the moderation of his enemies, and the patient endurance with which his Holiness supports his heavy and afflictive trial."—June 28.

Rev. James Meiler, P. P. of Castlebar, left Tuam on Friday, June 20th, on his mission to America, whither he will sail on Thursday, bearing with him the warmest good wishes of the people of this town, among whom he had so long and worthily officiated as minister of the gospel, and who, with his present particular flock of Castlebar, will not cease to pray for his safe and joyous return to Ireland. will not speak of the very painful want of a suitable Catholic church in Castlebar, for all Irishmen only efforts made by the local population towards the erection of a handsome and commodious house of worship—an ugh to say that foreign aid has become a necessity for the completion of the work, and it is now almost an appeal to Catholic Ireland "at home," and to whose Catholic brethren abroad, in a fairest spots. ## ROSABEL OF ROSS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON.

"Well, Judith, I will not say another word to distress you," said Donnell; "but if you love the Lady Anna I will tell you how you can save her from the designs of them that are her enemies, be they who they may."

"Oh, tell me, and I will fly to her this instant," cried the faithful girl; for, with all her giddiness and vanity, Judith Davys had an honest and affectionate heart; "I will warm her of her danger—I will lay down my life in her service; but I will not believe that my father is her enemy!"

"God help her," exclaimed Donnell, involuntarily expressing his commiseration aloud; "she is the dutiful daughter anyhow. Judith, if you make but half as good a wife as you do a daughter, the man who gets you, and that is worthy of you, will be surely born under a fortunate planet."

"Oh, sir," cried Judith, "have you nothing else to tell me but this idle story that every girl you ever spoke to has heard from you a hundred times before?"

"By all the bells in Ireland, Judith, there is not another girl within the four walls of the world, but yourself—"

"Oh, Master Donnell, how can you bear to banter a poor girl whose heart is breaking?" she exclaimed, with a reproachful appeal of her moist eyes which Donnell could not resist.

"Banter you, Judith!" he cried, clasping her in his arms; "no, no; it is little thought of folly or deceit you have left in my breast now! When I came here to-day, I might—God forgive me!—have been bent on wantonness and idleness; but, but now that I know you, Judith—now that I see the truth and kindliness and spirit that is in you, I love you better—by the hand of my body I do!—than I ever thought I could have loved any girl in the world!"

"Oh, Donnell, then," cried Judith, in tones as much altered as were Donnell's own, "girl me truly what danger this is that my young lady is in; and tell me, oh tell me with sincerity and truth, how it is that my poor father is concerned."

Donnell sighed, and sighed again before he could proceed; at length he gained about making a clean breast, with more pain than he had ever dreamt the narrative would cost him. Judith listened with eagerness and concern as Donnell related to her how his young chief, on his departure from Ossory, had been entrusted, by the only living relative of the Lady Anna, with her mother's jewels, which he had undertaken to deliver to her; and, how in his anxiety to fulfill his mission—for Donnell did not think it himself to run the risk of his life, to obtain an interview with her at the works that morning, since he had unfortunately been ignorant of her name and quality on the first opportunity he had of seeing her upon the bridge; "that same unlucky bridge," added Donnell, "on which I first lost my own heart, to a certain pair of blue eyes that I never thought to have seen tears standing in anyhow."

To all this Judith listened, as was natural, with considerable interest; but when Donnell went on to tell her that during MacGillpatrick's interview with the object of his search, he had seen her father and Master Richard accompanying Sir Gilbert in disguise, and that the knight was even discharging the office of a concealed spy upon his bride and mother, Judith's interest, although now heightened in strong curiosity, could not restrain the expression of her indignation and she exclaimed—"Shame upon him!—he upon him!—he cannot understand her—he is no more worthy such a bride, or he would never have stooped to this meanness! How can my father countenance such base conduct! Oh! poor young lady," she cried, "is it come to this, that you are to be treated with suspicion and indignity already? But I will find him out and shame him—I will go to my father and learn where he is this instant!"

Alas! poor Judith! she was little prepared for what was to follow, when Donnell went on to disabuse her of the fond belief that this was all. She stood like one in a dream as he proceeded to unfold the blackest features of the conspiracy; but when he mentioned the name of Father Edmund, she held up her hands in horror-struck astonishment—"Oh," she exclaimed, "to plot anything against him would be the work of men without hearts! Surely, surely, my father cannot know of this? I owe my life to the pious man; he saved me when I was perishing in the forest! Oh, Donnell, do not tell me that my father—"

Donnell sighed and shook his head.

"Oh, father—father!" was all that poor Judith could say, but with such an expression of reproachful anguish as made Donnell's very heart ache.

"Well, and what are you going to do now?" he said, as he observed her drawing her mantle over her shoulders, as if preparing to set forth on some resolutely determined expedition. "I am going first," she replied, "to warn my young lady and Father Edmond of the danger they are in; and I am then going to—to speak to my father," she said hurriedly; "and if this be as you say," she added, "to bid him farewell forever."

"And where would you go if you left your father's house, Judith?"

"To my aunt's, at Fethard," she replied; "or to my cousin's, in Ferns; or perhaps the Lady Rosabel would give me the shelter of her roof again; but anywhere rather than under one roof with him, if this be as you say."

"Judith, where will you meet me in two hours from this time?"

"Oh, do not talk to me of meetings now!" she cried—"now when I am panting from the house of my youth, perhaps forever; for if this story be true, I will never again set foot within its walls."

"But, Judith, say where I am to wait for you; for I am a stranger in the town, and we might, may be, miss one another among the streets and buildings," urged Donnell, perfectly satisfied that Judith was destined to go nowhere else but with himself into Ossory.

Judith paused and considered. "You must not come here again," she said at length, mournfully; "but if you really would serve me, Donnell, you will find me two hours hence in the little court behind my Lady Rosabel's mansion. You know the house, and the court is just on your left as you pass the great gateway."

"But, Judith we are marked men, and it would be as much as our lives are worth for the tierna and me to be seen sailing in the open quarter-yard."

"Stay, then," said Judith, after some further consideration, "I have a key of the private entrance to the apartments above; I got it no later than this morning to fetch some things to my young lady at the show. The apartments are unoccupied and locked, but I may safely let you into the hall, and you can wait there till I give three taps at the door." Saying this, she delivered the key to Donnell, who now began to prepare himself for the road by pulling his cowl once more over his face and buttoning up his long frock to the chin, resuming at the same time his friar's staff, with the crucifix at top, which had fallen unheeded during this conversation among the low rose-bushes at their side.

Seeing his companion making ready to depart, MacGillpatrick, who had been waiting most patiently for the end of their conference, advanced from the arbor. "Son of Brian," he exclaimed as he came forward, "our time is short, and while we dally here Gilbert may be gone from his place of concealment."

"I crave your nobleness' pardon," replied Donnell; "but, by St. Brendan, I had little thought of the sort of service I was volunteering when I took in hand to tell this unlucky news to my poor colleen here."

"Ah, I feared as much; she refuses to aid in thwarting the designs of her father."

"Not at all, tierna," replied poor Donnell; "she is the true-hearted friend to the banterns, and will do our lady—may danger gore and the Tongues, when I speak to her, can hardly find me a word to say. Oh, the Latin and divinity were bad enough; but those eyes, these eyes see what put the real confusion on a man after all."

"Come away," said Judith, perceiving by their looks that she was the subject of their conversation—"we waste our time; my father will soon be back, and I would die for all Ross he should find you here."

"Tell the colleen that MacGillpatrick thanks her," said the young chief to his interpreter, as they followed Judith to the house; "and give her this, Donnell," he added, taking a ring from his finger; "and tell her that, no matter what mayhappen to the devisers of this plot, she shall never want a home or a protector while the friends of her young lady are living and able to return a service."

Donnell took the gift and delivered it, with the prescribed message; and now they had reached the postern leading to the street. To Nickol Davys' burden there was no entrance, save through the house; but to the house there was a private door, on the side of the main street, the other leading to a narrow alley which ran by the back of the convent of St. Saviour's, in the direction of Lady Rosabel's mansion. It was by this latter passage that Judith dismissed the disguised Irishman, directing them how to make their way with the least risk of observation; for she had failed in persuading them to defer their dangerous attempt till a safer period of the day. Still as the town was all but deserted, the danger was far from being certain; and MacGillpatrick's eagerness to put what he felt a praiseworthy resolution into effect determined him on running all risks. Judith's course lay in an opposite direction, and the time was now come when Donnell and she must, for a time at least, bid farewell. It was not to be expected that, after the interchange of so much confidence and the acknowledgment of so much regard on both sides, the lovers should part without some more tender ceremony than a mere adieu; and therefore those who hear this history, and recollect that our Irishman was disguised as a Crouched Friar of St. Saviour's, will not be much surprised that Donnell and Judith should exhibit for one moment the spectacle of two cowls under a hood; after which Judith closed the door, and her lover and his chieftain proceeded on their dangerous undertaking.

But, however natural such a sight may appear in the eyes of those who have accompanied the parties through the transactions of the last half an hour, it certainly had a very different and much more serious appearance when presented to the astonished vision of Nickol Davys, who entered his house from the main street just as Judith, dismissed her friends by the lane. He had opened the door so softly that the noise quite escaped Judith, and it was not till she had locked the door after her lover, and turned to proceed upon her errand by the main street, that she was aware of her father's presence. When Judith beheld Nickol confronting her with wrath in his countenance and opprobrium rising to his lips, she stood for a moment forgetful of all her causes of indignation against him, thinking only how she could best escape from his just censure for conduct seemingly so improper. Her first impulse was to assure him her friend was not a monk, as he appeared to be; but Nickol gave her no time for explanation or defense. "Hussy!" he exclaimed, bursting in with a face of fury—"hussy! is it thus you employ yourself in your father's absence? Will nothing satisfy you but to have frocked gallants, liked Mistress Medlicot?"

"Oh, father, you wrong me most shamefully!" cried Judith, all her excuses cast aside in indignation at the unworthy comparison.

"Wrong you?" repeated Nickol; "have I not my eyesight, and do not see the shaven profligate and his hypocrite companion leaving my house? Aye, hussy, did I not see yourself clasped in the villain's arms as he took his leave?"

"Indeed, father, he was no monk. I thought you respected both my and your clergy too much to think of charging either the one or the other with such a sin!" cried Judith.

"Don't tell me a falsehood," replied her father; "it is not the first time I have seen him—nor, by St. Mark, will it be the last! I will have him before his prior, and his brother; aye, I will expose him, though he take sanctuary under the nose of the Pope's holiness! Ah, he forgot—"

"On the word of a maiden, and I take the holy Virgin to witness—" began Judith.

"Silence!" cried her father; "would you add falsehood to—to conduct that I am ashamed to name! Get to your chamber, and prepare to leave Ross this very night. You are all too long here!"

"If I am to be treated thus," replied Judith, with resentful looks and a voice which began to shake with fixed passion—"if my word is not to be believed, and if my character is to be blackened by my own father, I will be sooner I leave a roof which, instead of affording me protection, only exposes me to unmerited insult, the better."

"Why, how now, minx?" cried her father, amazed to such bold flashing of reproachful defiance, "are you so secure in the power of your priestly paramours?"

"It is a shame for you, sir, to defame your daughter so," exclaimed Judith, her indignation rising as she recollected the grievous charges made against the man before her; "it is a shame and a sin for you to calumniate your clergy as you are doing and as you have done!"

"Why, hussy, what do you mean?" cried Nickol, fiercely grasping his daughter by the arm.

"If you know yourself what I mean, father," cried the undaunted Judith, "you know yourself the tale you have undertaken to tell Sir Gilbert."

"Powers of darkness! she must have overheard us in the garden!" exclaimed the conscience struck conspirator; but a sense overcoming his momentary confusion, he demanded fiercely—"Hussy, how dare you play the eavesdropper on my private concerns—how dare you, you hussy!" and shook her at the same time with a violence that, while it terrified, roused her to more open invective. "For shame, sir," she cried, "to lay your own daughter; it is unnatural and unmanly to abuse me so! I played on no eavesdropping on you, sir, nor on privacy; but I know who it is that his enemies have persuaded to play the spy upon his own flesh and blood—I know who it is that has held both his own and his people's benefactress to screen himself from the just penalty of his own misconduct; I know who they are that have plotted to rob the best and kindest lady and the holiest churchman in all Leinster by gulleful and malignant calumnies instilled into the ears of a duped and defrauded gentleman; I know—"

"You know too much to remain here," said Nickol, taking her arm under his, "walk with me towards the bridge and I will undeceive you as we go."

"Oh, father!" cried Judith, who, although unable to resist the impulse which had prompted her words, had really wished most heartily, while uttering them, that her half-involuntary accusations might prove unfounded—"oh, father, my that I have been misinformed! I knew that you had done wrong, and God knows that if you did, it was no fault of mine; for many a time I have dared your anger as I do now, in the hope to prevent you; but, blamables as I know you to be, I could not have believed this story—I cannot yet believe it! Only say that you could not have the heart to injure my dear young lady—that you have plotted no ill against Edmund, my friend and benefactor—"

"But this course is nearly run," continued Sir Gilbert, "my brothers will be here in less than an hour. I would have them witnesses to my wrongs and to my vengeance! Ah, den of thieves!" he cried, shaking his clenched hand at the towers of the monastery, where they rose in lofty pinnacles over the tops of the surrounding buildings, "Ah, nurse of hypocrites, and hotbed of profligacy! before that setting sun rises again, there shall not be one stone of you left on the top of another!"

"Heaven send the time!" cried Nickol, "many a heavy heart it would lighten in the town if the knaves were delivered away, root and branch."

"Root and branch, hip and thigh!" responded the enraged knight, as he strode on towards the bridge, ever and anon casting furious looks at the habitation of his supposed enemies.

"Noble sir," said Nickol, after they had walked some paces in silence, "may I make bold to ask, what it is your pleasure that I should do?"

Religious Intolerance.

The subjoined article, taken from the Marysville Appeal, is very creditable as coming from a non-Catholic journal. If the liberal spirit which it breathes were universal in our community, there would be no such thing as bigotry and sectarian as the "Crescents" know it;

We read occasional reference in the San Francisco papers to a secret organization existing in that city, known as the Order of the Crescents, the sole aim of which, so far as is now known, is to be prejudicial to the admission of all men who profess or believe the Roman Catholic faith. The Order is confined to no political party, but admits to membership all who will subscribe to some sort of an iron-clad oath pledging the member to oppose the political aspirations of every man professing the Roman Catholic faith. As yet the principles of the Order is said to have exerted considerable influence, but the recent vote in this city is said to show that the reports of its strength have been greatly exaggerated. The principles upon which these Orders are founded are in direct violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and propose to declare which religion is right and which is wrong, assuming an infallibility of judgment.

Pretending to fear that the influence of the Catholic Church will be exercised to the detriment if not the destruction of our free institutions, and for the maintenance of a plan for controlling the contingency, it is worked secretly and by stealth, these secret societies do the very thing which they pretend to others, and attempt to prevent intolerance and proscription by counter-intolerance and proscription. If the Catholic Church had not so common understanding among its adherents as to political and other secular matters, the organizations of hostile bodies would not be aware of the Order of the Crescents would not only promise but perspectively promising. Lead slate and copper also abound, and coal he been found in rich deposits.

NEVADA.

A Dutch Flat correspondent of the Taken Republican says the following gives a fair idea of the clean-ups of some of the hydaulic mines in that section for the month of June:

Of the mines of the Cedar Creek Gold Mining and Water Company, the Rector mine cleaned up $3,214.61 Jebarning, 220 26; Central, $5, 876 24; Home Test, $2,846 92—which, added to the sail of water, swells the total amount of receipts to $26,089 34. The total receipts for those mines during July 14 amounted to the smaglic sum of $176,000.

The Summit Company's claim, sited on Ring Ugly Hill, recently made a small run for the season, cleaning up the sum of $7,334 16, the expenses of extracting which were $4,097, leaving a net dividend of $3,257 16, which was divided among his shareholders. The ground is about forty-three days of twelve hours each—eighteen hours of water.

SAN BERNARDINO.

The San Bernardino Guardian of ate date gives the following particulars relative to the newly discovered Arrington Ditch:

The mines in this district are become to be almost as famous as those in the Kern and Hodgson Valley districts. Up a large quantity of very rich ore hasen taken from the mines, and the yield of crude buffion in San Francisco form $650 to $700 per ton. The leads are increasing in thickness and richness, so far, are Big Blue, Lone Valley, Sonoma and Cet. These mines are situated about 60 les northeast of San Bernardino, near old Cucamonga city, and 15 miles from Cucamonga Valley and 30 or 60 miles from

The order is confined to no political party, but admits to membership all who will subscribe to some sort of a test oath, and pledging the member to oppose the political aspirations of every man professing the Roman Faith. Order is said to have exerted considerable influence in the late primaries in San Francisco; and the avowed object of the order is to defeat the aspirations of the vile wretches, Terrence Donahue and Thomas Maguire, who have been nominated by the Democracy for Supervisors. This is a secret service of the devices, and the spirit of the Constitution, and refuses to declare which religion is good enough for an office, thus creating an infallibility test.

Proceeding to fear that the influence of the Catholic Church will be exercised to the detriment of not the destruction of our free institutions, the Crescents have formed a plan for controlling the country, it is working fervently and secretly to that end, these secret societies do the very thing which they denounce in others, and attempt to prevent intolerance and proscription. If the Catholic Church has any common understanding among its adherents as to political and other secular matters, the organizations of hostile movements of the character of the Order of the Crescents would not only provoke resistance, but might be carried to that extent that the adherents of the Catholic faith would be compelled to organize for the sole purpose of self-defense. We have seen the time when men were attacked on the streets and in their houses, when houses and dwellings were sacked and women and children turned into the streets, simply because they were Catholics; and it is the duty of every lover of liberty to see that the land to which the Pilgrim Fathers fled in order that they might worship God according to their own conscience, and where this right is for all time to come, may never witness a recurrence of such scenes.

We know nothing of the design of the Catholic Church, but it is clear to any other ecclesiastic, but this is certain, that there should be no such terrible deep laid scheme on foot to subvert the Government without some evidences of the conspiracy cropping out and there is no question but the development of any such a plan would lead to its prompt and overwhelming defeat. The Catholic Church is too strong in proportion to all the remainder of our Christian people to be that bold and bent together in secret conclave with wiles and grips and pass-words, and maintain an army of spies to keep watch and a still greater army of men sworn to vidis for their country? Is the effort against the supposed schemes of the Pope of Rome. The mere application of a religious test to political candidates is a monstrosity, and the only effect it will have if persisted in will be to compel the Catholics to consolidate and apply a similar test in their own behalf. Liberty at its very core, we regret to see such a movement encouraged by Republican papers, as it is a direct violation of the liberal principles that called the party into existence, and has made it strong and great because of its ignoring all distinctions of nativity, hue or creed, and recognizing the rights of all citizens as equal.

On the 3d of May last the Commissioner of the Land Office at Washington received from the Surveyor-General's office at Santa Fe, New Mexico, the official plat of the Las Vegas Grant, which was confirmed to the Las Vegas Town Company, by the Board of Land Commissioners, and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and patented by the President of the United States, in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court. The plat includes the Las Vegas Hot Springs, and contains about 496 square miles. The Commissioner did not file the approved survey with the Register and Receiver of the land district in which the land is situated, as required by law, until the 1st day of July, 1873, at which time the title to the land vested in the grantee, and deeds were made to the Register and Receiver by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

MINING SUMMARY.

CALAVERAS COUNTY.

The Calaveras Chronicle of the 19th has the annexed items:

About the richest quartz we ever saw was brought to town the other day by some parties who recently discovered the lead from which it was taken. The vein is situated near Donnalake's bridge, about seven miles from Mokelumne Hill. The rock was so strong together with gold that it could scarcely be broken in pieces.

As we passed through San Andreas last Monday, our attention was attracted at the Lloyd Bros.' gravel mine situated in that village. The claim is an old river bed or channel varying from 100 to 200 feet in width—the pay strata—from 2 to 4 feet in depth and from 50 to 60 feet below the surface. The mine is drained by a tunnel 800 feet long. The Messrs. Lloyd has a splendid income from their mine, which they well merit for their enterprise.

MONTEREY.

The Hollister Independent of the 19th instant says: "It is perhaps not generally know that the country east of the Gabilan, in the vicinity of Hollister, south aucast, is rich in mineralogical resources. Immense veins of iron and manganese abound. There are several mines in working order, two but a short distance from the San ssilio road, which yield a pickwilver yield large and prospectively promising. Lead sists of copper and iron pyrites, and coal is been found in rich deposits."

NEVADA.

A Dutch Flat correspondent of the Tahoe Republican gives the following figure as the clean-ups of some of the hydraulic mines in that section for the month of June:

Of the mines of the Cedar Creek did Mining and Water Company, the first mine cleaned up 1,000 inches of hydraulic, 220 26; Central, $5, 876 24; Home Test, $3,846 92—total, $10,083 42. Of the water, swells the total amount of result to $28,089 34. The total receipts for these sending July 1st amounted to the snuggle sum of $176,000.

The Nonnish Company's claim, sided on Plug Ugly Hill, recently made imal run for the season, cleaning up the sa $7,354 16, the expenses of extracting sch were $2,097, leaving a net dividend of $5, pay. Yesterday, the claim was washed 257 16, which was divided among the shareholders. The claim was washed forty-three days of twelve hours eachelding 480 inches of water.

SAN BERNARDINO.

The San Bernardino Guardian of late gives the following particulars of the rich discoveries to the newly discovered Arlington Dist.

The mines in this district are become so be almost as famous as those in the Lead and Holcomb Valley districts. Quite a large quantity of very rich ore has been taken from the mines, which has a lie crude bullion in San Francisco forum $656 to $700 per ton. The leads there principally been worked, so far, are the Blue Bloss, Lone Valley, Sonoma and Ida. These mines are situated about 60 lea northeast of San Bernardino, near old Cosenberry city, and 15 miles from Bridcomb Valley, and 50 or 60 men are employ in working them. Two companies are now making arrangements to put up samp works.

SANTA CLARA.

The San José Mercury says, speak of the Guadalupe quicksilver mines:

It may not be generally known to the public that three furnaces, or rather boxes these valuable ore months. [illegible] of a few weeks, but, for reasons satisfactory to the company, the mines [illegible] limited to narrow extent. Superintendent Bunting work until the arrival of the president, Mr. Merrifith of Baltimore, who is expected soon. When he arrives, it is possible that measures will be taken, to increase the force of the development of these rich mines to a large extent.

The Santa Cruz Sentinel of Saturday the following item:

On the coast cliffs, north of Laguna Creek, may be seen large bodies of meteoric ore cropping out amid shale and chalk; and as if blistered by the hot sun. We have never seen better indications of a good mine. There are evidences of heavy veins in the creek basin on the south side of the road and in the hillsides near the cottage. Prof. Blake pronounces the ore rich, and as indicated by the rather yellow color of the iron rust scum which oozes up thru the boggy soil, it is also heavy in gold. The whole coast range, from Santa Cruz to below Pebbly Beach is veined with rich ore. At the Yellow Bank dairy the physarts of iron have discolored the ground and clay-stone many rods. We believe that there is iron enough in the bank to Harbor to build all the railroads requires the State, if reduced to rails, ties, fis and spikes.

It is certainly worth some prospects time, who is competent to know, to go and see some of the ore and have it assay Another curious feature in the land in section is the brilliant pebbles—cornelia, jasper, agate, ore,—which abound and other bright gravel stones on the beach These pebbles are in a layer eighteen inches wide and about two feet below the surface of the soil all along the plateau from the beach. The encroachment of the sea and water from the bluffs has washed them down into the surf, where they are constantly being pulled into modern Injants, much sought after by curiosity seekers, who pick them up by bushels and carry them away to do work into jewelry, seldom vases and flower pots or ornamental garden walks. Some of the pebbles are very beautiful and of considerable value

YUBA.

The Enterprise Company, operating Smartsville, says the Grass Valley Tidings, will soon have the great tunnel completed, and be ready for washing rich gravel. Th tunnel is a mile and a quarter long, a portion of it being in the tuff. The tunnel is four feet wide and nine feet high and seven fe wide at the bottom. The tunnel is now something like $100,000. The Enterpri has a great body of gravel, which prospec well from surface to bed rock.

Arizona.

The Arizona Miner, of the 12th inst., has information from Mohave county, in Hardlipai district the Cupel and Tiger Gold Solidated are taking out rock that will average $900 per ton. Fifty tons of ore on th Tiger dump will go $200-$3 per cent. lea. The Reindeer has just shipped five tons of ore through Cory & Potts that will average $500.

Little Chief—Shaft 25 feet deep, two ore bodies showing; taking out ore that will go $1,200 per ton.

The New Era has 100 shafts down five feet each, and working four men. In some of ore on the dump average $500 per ton. They have just completed a shipment of ten tons, and worked the tons in the Pioneer mill. On a bet, Potts made an assay from five pounds of ore that went $1,600. Potts is smelting 100 pounds that will go $12,000 per ton.

The Truth of the Story.

The following extract from an article published in the American Patriot Register, shows what opinion enlightened and liberal minded Protestants hold concerning the religious struggle in Germany:

A greater war than any yet known in history has begun in Prussia between Christianity and infidelity. The Catholic Bishops have spoken out boldly. Their appeal to the Chambers while in deliberation, next to the Emperor, are the bills had become law, and finally they commended the faithful for their determination to serve God on their consciences dictates. The Protestant ministers are equally firm. The fractious disclaimer in the Parliament has been ineffective. Private individuals do not lag behind public men. Thus we find the religious thought of the country gathered into one compact, serried band of sixteen millions girded for the fight, and prepared to suffer though not to yield. What is to be said will the Government and Bismarck do? The latter, no doubt, has made up his mind to brave all the consequences, though even he knows eye they cannot be measured. The Emperor is still led by the Chancellor, despite his own lazy sort of Christian belief. The Emperor will dispose for religion, has lost all influence; the Crown Prince and Princess, no friends to Bismarck, are powerless, so the chancellor's will be done and only, supporters—but they are numerous—believe to the end. Throughout the length of the State, Bismarck has girded the new empire with a triple line of fortresses, but he does not know that by the means of which we refer he is preparing with his own hands the true revenge of France.

BREACH OF PROMISE.—A motion was made in Chambers given the following figure as the clean-ups of some of the hydraulic mines in that section for the month of June:

Of the mines of the Cedar Creek did Mining and Water Company, the first mine cleaned up 1,000 inches of hydraulic, 220 26; Central, $5, 876 24; Home Test, $3,846 92—total, $10,083 42. Of the water, swells the total amount of result to $28,089 34. The total receipts for these sending July 1st amounted to the snuggle sum of $176,000.

The Nonnish Company's claim, sided on Plug Ugly Hill, recently made imal run for the season, cleaning up the sa $7,354 16, the expenses of extracting sch were $2,097, leaving a net dividend of $5, pay. Yesterday, the claim was washed 257 16, which was divided among the shareholders. The claim was washed forty-three days of twelve hours eachelding 480 inches of water.

The Career of a Great Remedy.

Twenty Summers have elapsed since it was firstly announced to the public that a medicine, bearing the name of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, had been added to the list of proprietary and advertised medicines. The modest advertisement which invited attention to the preparation, stated that it had been for years in private use by the medical faculty as a cure for dyspepsia, bilious complaints, constipation and intermittent fever. It could soon discovered that the article possessed virtues of a remarkable character, and that it was not only a cure for the diseases for which it was first recommended, but for many others of a kindred nature. Its reputation soon spread beyond the limits of the city in which it was manufactured, and the demand for it increased with such rapidity as to astonish even the most sanguine of its friends. Dyspepsia, indigestion, biliousness, intermittent fevers, nervousness, constipation, liver complaint, rheumatism, and other diseases originating in a vitiated and tainted atmosphere, vanish under its influence as surely as the mists of night before the sun. It has been recommended by ministers of intelligent testimony, examined by chemists of high standing, and prescribed by physicians of thousands of well known citizens, and has received the unqualified approval of hundreds of thousands of persons. It has also obtained the patronage of nearly for a quarter of a century, and has received the unqualified approval of millions of independent sovereigns, and its praises resound in their HOSTETTER'S OUR BEST POLICY.—In the age of corruption and unfair dealing it is pleasant to see that honesty is sometimes the best policy," and that those merchants who deal the most honorably in their business are always the most successful in business. But turn to the advertisement observing that H. Stoebers & Bro. the well-known grocers, at 331 and 333 Fourth street, established in this city since 1853, are now improving their business by moving to a more modern iron front part in their building, which, when finished, will be one of the most elegant business houses on the Pacific Coast. They have been prominent in the wholesale grocery and commission trade, not only in this city, but throughout the Pacific States and Territories, and have established by their well known reputation for honesty and fair dealing.

IRELAND.

Proposing to Elope on his Marriage Morning.

The case of Connor vs. Leahy was heard at the Kerry Assizes on 24th July. The action was for damages for breach of promise to marry.

Mary Connor deposed—I am the plaintiff. I live at Kilmainham. I am not twenty-one years of age yet. I have known the defendant since I was born. I remember the year 1869. Before that defendant made a proposal of marriage. He first proposed about six years ago.[1] I remember when he got married to his first wife. He was courting me up to then—two years. He proposed to me, but my father would not give his consent. The day he was married he came to my house on that morning on his way to be married. He wanted me to marry him then. He asked me would not I elope with him? I said I would not. He then went to my father and asked him his leiwsse him from the promise he made. I told him I would, and I did, and he was married in less than half an hour. After his wife's death I met the defendant near Broose, and he asked me was there any chance for him now. I said that could not be done, as he has been married so my first cousin. The week after he asked me to marry him. I said I did not think we would be married, and he asked me to go to London to get married to him. He asked me to give him my hand and word that I would marry no other man. I did so, and he did the same, promising that he would marry no other person before me. He sent James Grancy afterwards for me. I met him quite convenient to my father's house. I asked him what he wanted, and he said it was to make a promise of marriage to me, and he there promised me.

Cross-examined by Mr. Atkinson—The morning he was going to be married you were singing on the road? I was. I did not care about him. No person saw me courting me while Leahy was spliced. I did not care about getting married.

Q.—Why should you change your mind? A.—About three months after.

John Grancy deposed that he carried a message from the defendant to the plaintiff desiring her to meet him. Witness and plaintiff went to meet the defendant, and the defendant said as the plaintiff was always doubting him he was willing to make certain he would make the promise in presence of 4 witness. Defendant asked plaintiff to hold out her right hand; she did, and defendant took it and said, "My right hand in your right hand, like a married couple." He said he would marry her before all other women. Witness met defendant and asked him why he was breaking his promise. He said bad advisers, and telling challenge by another girl.

The jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff—£200 damages.

Rent Grievance.

Mr. Delahunty has got hold of a very substantial Irish grievance. On Monday evening in the House of Commons he extracted from Mr. Lowe the admission that while advances are made to public bodies in England for local works at the rate of three and and a half per cent., four and latterly five per cent. is charged on similar advances made to Ireland. In the words of the Express, which is no staunch a supporter of English rule, when Ireland makes a "charitable application" for money, she must pay the full rate of interest; but when the State shall be lent to her to be other parts of the kingdom for the purpose of executing local works of permanent utility, the preference is either point blank refused or it is complied with upon extortionate terms. The only defence of the wrong that Mr. Lowe could think of at the moment was that loans in England were required for a much shorter time than in Ireland. But Mr. Delahunty, who seems to be thoroughly well "posted up" in the matter, replied by asking Mr. Lowe whether it was not a fact that "the time allowed for the repayment of loans in England was double that allowed in Ireland;" and Mr. Lowe was not able to give any answer on this point. Mr. Delahunty ultimately gave notice that he would on an early date give the Chancellor of the Exchequer an opportunity of giving a more satisfactory reply.

An Eccentric Professor.

Professor Purcell O'Leary, who went like a madiac through the streets of Queenstown, recently, dressed to represent the Shan-a-Fane, in a yellow suit and chanois knee-breeches, armed with a quiver, bow, arrow and a large club, and wearing a gold crown for a cap, was arrested late in the evening and brought before Messrs. Macleod and Beamish, charged with creating a row at one of his servants, and firing an arrow over her head. The servant-girl's gentleman was walking through the town all day, followed by crowds, especially a number of small boys, who thought it was some kind of a wild Indian, and in several instances made them fly in all directions with his club and arrows. Colonel Lloyd was attacked by him near the Royal Cork Yacht Club, his hat knocked off, and was obliged to fly for refuge to the Cork Club House. He then went home to Cobh and encountered a young woman selling fish and berries at his house. He met her with a loaded pistol, a dreadful oath, and nearly frightened the poor creature out of her wits; after which he reduced some of his house furniture to splinters with a sword. He was lodged in Bridewell, on remand, for eight days.—Cork Examiner.

The Newtownattwert Murder.

Sub-Inspector Montgomery was put on his trial for the third time on Monday for the murder of the bank clerk in Newtownatwert. Judge Barry, as on the last occasion on which this case was investigated, presided, and the array of counsel on either side is the same, with the exception that the Attorney-General himself is engaged for the Crown in addition to Sergeant Armstrong. A jury was not obtained without some difficulty, several jurors not having answered to their names at all, and several others having been ordered to stand aside from one cause or another. The Attorney-General stated the facts of the murder, which it is hardly necessary to repeat here. As we write, the trial is still proceeding, but it is not likely to close before the end of the week. We should add that the reports of the different newspapers concur in stating that the accused appeared to possess the coolness, self-possession and composure which characterized his demeanor on the two former trials.—Nation, July 26.

Obsequies of the Rev. Michael B. O'Donoghue.

On Monday, at eleven and solemn High Mass was celebrated for the repose of the soul of the Rev. Michael B. O'Donoghue, in the church of the Most Sacred Heart, Donnybrook. At the conclusion of the ceremonies, the remains were accompanied by a numerous and affected concourse from the church to the cemetery of Glasnevin, and committed to the grave with all the solemn and affecting ceremonial with which the Catholic Church in want to hallow the repose of the departed soul and consolate the survivors. For over thirty years the deceased clergyman combined the office of chaplain to the Donnybrook convent with the exercise of his parochial duties. His history is the history of the Irish priest —little known outside the sphere of his missionary labors, but loved and revered by those among whom his lot was cast. He lived his life of ample usefulness. His active zeal and his immoderate benevolence obtained or sought no recompense on earth save the consciousness of well doing and the sincere affection that can be purchased only by disinterested kindness. But the Great Master whom he served so well has at length called him to receive the higher and holier reward that he labors and his virtues merited.—Weekly Register, July 26.

Conversation of the Most Rev. Dr. Power.

Sunday, July 20, the Most Rev. Dr. Power was consecrated Bishop of Waterford, in succession to the late lamented Most Rev. Dr. O'Brien, in the noble cathedral of Waterford, in the presence of a vast congregation and a crowded assemblage of priests and clergy. From an early hour people of every rank and class from the surrounding country began to flock in great numbers, and flocked to the cathedral, which was soon filled in every section set apart for the laity. Among the congregation were the Corporation of Waterford, the Corporation of Dungarvan, headed by W. Keasely, Esq., Mayor, and the Corporation of Clonmel, with their robes of office, headed by Mr. Cantwell, Mayor. At the last named civic body came to pay a mark or tribute of honor and respect to the late Bishop, and to present him with an address and a splendidly emblazoned parchment containing the munificent gift of £800. As the time approached for the solemn ceremonial to commence the interior of the sacred edifice presented a grand and solemn appearance. The high altar and sanctuary were splendidly decorated, as was also the altar of the Blessed Sacrament.—Freely Reporter.

Death of the Rev. J. Lonergan, O. S. A.

On the 9th inst., in the Abbey, Fethard, county Tipperary, after a protracted illness, the Rev. James Lonergan, O. S. A., died at the comparatively early age of 39.—Among the many graces and resplendent virtues with which this truly pious, zealous and venerable priest was adorned, like a marble couple," He said he would marry her before all other women. Witness met defendant and asked him why he was breaking his promise. He said bad advisers, and telling challenge by another girl.

Young. A High Mass and Office were celebrated for him in the Augustinian chapel, at which fourteen clergymen assisted, and the sanctuary would not have been threefold, but that a retreat of the clergy of the Archdiocese was being held in Thurles, which prevented a larger attendance.—Weekly Register, July 26.

Purchase of Tenantry.

The County Dublin Tenants' Defense Association have sounded a note of warning to the farmers of the country to which intelligent and earnest attention should be given. The manifesto we refer to pointed out that all classes in the country depend upon the farmers, who, nevertheless, "have never been more ill-used and more ignorant of their rights." It also added the names of the parents and relatives of the pupils, besides others interested in the promotion of education.

It is stated that the accounts of the Dublin Exhibition have declared itself to open at building on one day in each week as an admission fee of sixpence.

A farmer at Comber committed suicide on the Belfast and Down Railway, by throwing himself across the rails in front of a train. He is believed to have been insane.

At Ennis, the inquiry into what is known as the female threshing case ended in a verdict of the committal of the prisoner, Bridget Kerrigg, for trial at the next assizes. Bail was refused.

A return brought down to the end of May shows that since the 1st of January, 1871, there have been 4,195 applications to the Church Commissioners by owners of land in Ireland, under the 32d section of the Irish Church Act, to enable them to purchase, by fifty two years' installments, their tithe rentcharge.

At the County Mayo Assizes, July 19th, Walter Nash, who was convicted the previous day of the murder of his wife, was sentenced by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald to be executed on the 19th of August. His landship held out no hope of mercy. The crime was committed when Walsh was in a state of drunkenness.

At the Down Assizes the jury were unable to agree in the case of Arthur Donnelly, who was charged with firing a shot at Head-pound to his soul's advantage to enter a monastery, informed his father—an opulent farmer—of his intention. That determination, it were freaks of prejudice and faults of vision, secretly relished a craving for bigoted and bitterly disappointed advocates. As you will have guessed, such indecencies are addressed, not to the people alone, but to Protestant England, in order to convince it that the defendant is the object of a priestly conspiracy to rob him of his reason, and that it behooves every loyal Protestant to subscribe towards his defense. That done, money will be forthcoming entertain no doubt whatever. Lord Shaftesbury has already given £50, and there are undoubtedly many in the strong box of the Protestant Alliance.—Nation, July 26.

Green Fire.

A woman, said to be a connection of the Desmonds whom the police frustlessly endeavored to imprison in the Clerkenwell outrage, has been arrested whilst wheeling a box containing phosphorus through the streets. Our noble newspapers have already let her down as a Fenian, and Mr. Inspector Campbell (who got his charming allowance last week) is flourishing his dauntless broadsword over the unoffending lady. If my information is to be relied on, the detectives have got hold of a very excellent man's case. I trust the discovery may do them good. The Desmonds, with one exception, have left Ireland for the time. Despite the malignant efforts made to ruin them during a period of the greatest excitement ever witnessed in this country, not a number of the churches in Rome, commencing with that of St. Pudenziana. The name of that church will always recall the association of events connected with the late Cardinal Wiseman, Archbishop of Westminster, who died in Rome, and whose funeral obsequies took place in that church. The Church they uprooted all the Irish Church can do very well without them, and are long they will have to wait before they will find as many steadfast friends and supporters throughout Ireland.—Weekly Register, July 26.

SPAIN.

False Reports.

The anarchy produced in the Peninsula by the infamous military and naval rebellion of June is approaching rapidly to the end where its course must end. Even the unyielding courage of the Bourbons, and the despatches sent specially to Madrid to rouse up the Republic and white down the Monarchy, even these falsifiers of facts in the Carlist camp, have been at last forced to admit that the Royal cause is almost smashed; that the Federal Republic is all but established. And the admission has that gave much against the grain. So much so, indeed, that the Carlist friends of the Anarchists, that they cannot forget the days of dazzling the English reader, though it be but for a moment. Yet for instance, on Saturday last they telegraphed to London that the Carlist rebels and Government forces had the day before, on that day fought a severe battle which lasted eighteen hours, and the losses of both sides were heavy, but that the rebels were beaten, and had to retreat, leaving the ground covered with their dead and wounded. It is true that a great battle had been fought at Estella, between Alfonsist, the brother of Don Carlos, and General Serrano, and that the former had been defeated. The defense was vigorous. Night having come on, the Carlist troops retired from the field themselves, and the attack was renewed, and after eighteen hours' fighting Alfonsist retreated, and at discretion—the victory being for the Carlists.—Weekly Register, July 26.

GERMANY.

The German Catholics.

While in Prussia the persecution of the Church of the minority is steadily progressing, the Austrian Government have of its own to see that it does not pay to exasperate the feelings of the Catholic people who form a compact majority in the realm of the Hapsburgs. The late financial crisis in the latter country has given rise to a large proportion of the middle classes in which indifference or actual hostility to the nation and to religion had been for many years—approach of the time when the people will be rallied upon to pass judgment on the past conduct of the Government, and the prospect of an entire discomfiture of its prevailing policy. The effect of pressure—all this has tended to change the tone of the powers that be with regard to the Catholic party. The Emperor Francis Joseph has just declared that if they like to keep their place they must give up all opposition to the Catholic party as their special care.

The Lord Chief Justice (Whiteside) of Ireland congratulations to the Grand Jury of county Meath yesterday. All the duties which had been sent in, he said, by police and experienced officers, spoke many language, and justified that return diminished. There were only five cases in the calendar, and the result of the consabulary was a very gratifying document. There was scarcely anything to be noted.

Mr. Justice O'Brien, in opening the Kilmainham yesterday at Clonmel, for the North Riding of Tipperary, observed that calendar contained a number of assault cases, but none of them were aggravated ones, caused doubtlessly by accounts of the returns of the county inspector and only twenty-five cases altogether were worthy to be recorded." In the North Riding of the same county the criminal business did not exceed that of the Judge for Limerick.

Mr. Justice Fitzgerald opened the assizes for the county of Sligo yesterday, and said that a very satisfactory state of things was evidenced in the official returns. There were only seven indictable offenses even remotely approaching the character of crime. Of these none were agrarian, nothing to which nine-tenths of the people of the country might be traced, had been witnessed."

The Commission for the city of Limerick opened yesterday by Baron Deasy,

A GLORIOUS EXAMPLE.

IRELAND'S CONSECRATION TO THE SACRED HEART.

Now who have read the beautiful and touching description of the consecration of Ireland to the Sacred Heart, by March last, could fail to enter with heartfelt earnestness, "How sweet, and how divine!" Such a heart and such a home that prompted the solemn, sacred offering! and most fitting was it that the great heart of long-suffering Erin should be the consecrated to the Sacred Heart. Ireland! that for long days of sorrow, her Divine Master and Model, first placed out this beautiful example to be followed by other lands, and particularly by our own favored country, where his noble discoverers planted the true, and then converted the infidel to the faith of Christ, and who first manifested to the world the glorious results to be had from obedience to be translated that whom he fully fully serve—to serve the Most Sacred Heart. Ireland united the glad bishop of Love to the sacrament grasp, and taught the docile child of the wilderness a breathe the sweet name of Jesus! Barely ever the present sir rather the rhonds of materialism and unbelief, and taught our dazed the Orang gloom had the sweet, sunshine of Christ. Ireland! Ireland! Ireland!

MASONRY IN PERNAMBUCO.

We have not as yet received a trustworthy account of the conflict now progressing in parts of the Brazilian Empire between the Catholic hierarchy and the Masonic fraternity. From details which are already before us, however, we gather that the cause of the agitation is an endeavor on the part of the bishops to maintain discipline and carry out the laws of the Church relating to secret societies. Every educated person knows that a Catholic is forbidden, under penalty of excommunication, to become member of any society which demands an oath of secrecy and is hostile to religion and government. A man who deliberately swears to keep secret proceedings the nature of which he is not allowed to know until after he has bound himself, although he may be of opinion that such proceedings are in no wise his enable, but, on the contrary, laudable—fetters his conscience and practically forms an immoral act. He solemnly calls God to witness that he will never disclose to others or in any way give publicity to matters which, for aught he knows at the time, may require open condemnation; and thus he becomes guilty of what may be called a sacrilegious indiscretion. The fact that all he is made acquainted with, subsequent to the taking of the oath, may be of an innocent character, cannot be alleged as a justification for his conduct. Ex post facto justification is no justification at all.

This is a moral principle which does not admit of controversy or dispute. Consequently, instead of people affecting to wonder why the Catholic Church forbids her children to enter secret societies, the wonder ought be that any Christian denomination should be found to sanction even indirectly such loose morality. But Catholicity, first and above all things, enforces obedience to the laws of God; the secret societies, as a rule, are willing to condone the gravest infractions of the moral code for the sake of an apparent acceptance of their peculiar tenets. Again, the Masonic Association not only demands this immoral and indefensible oath from its members, but it has constituted itself a hostile to Christianity. This is loudly denied by many, but it has been repeatedly established beyond the possibility of doubt. Every organization must be judged, not by the individual opinions and sympathies of its members, but by the spirit actuating the whole body—by the authoritative pronouncements of its leading officers. Now, volumes could be filled with declarations made by the very highest Masonic dignitaries, to the effect that the scope and objects of the society are the replacing of revealed faith by what they term the religion of humanity, and the destruction of every vestige of Christianity. These confessions have appeared in official publications; they never have been either contradicted or repudiated, and therefore the organization is rightfully held accountable for them. To be sure there are thousands of Masons who are excellent citizens, whose lives in public and private are beyond reproach, and who would indignantly deny that they entertained any designs against Christian faith; but their personal feelings cannot be taken as an offset against the notorious character of the body.

Now we would leave it to intelligent and honorable men whether it is any wonder that the Catholic Church is opposed to such an organization, or whether its hostility to it should be imputed as intolerance. The duty of the Catholic Church is clear and unmistakable; she must denounce and condemn any society the tendency of which is to impede the accomplishment of her divine mission. With this duty unsparingly and the scandalous pandering to popular caprice, exhibited by the innumerable sects into which Protestantism has divided itself, she has not the remotest connection. Now when a man brought up as a Catholic meditates joining the Masonic fraternity he knows very well he has a choice to make. If he becomes a Freemason, he ipso facto ceases to be a Catholic; he violates a rule of his Church, and he must accept the penalty. To owe a similar easily apprehended—he might as well think he could take part in Republican conventions, vote the Republican ticket on all occasions, and continue to be recognized as a Democrat. He knows perfectly well the penalty to which he exposes himself—or rather, to put the matter more correctly, the penalty which he inflicts upon himself—and he has no right to complain of it. He deliberately prefers the lodge to the house of God, the philanthropy of his brethren to the teachings of Jesus Christ, and it is absurd for him to imagine himself scathed because he is simply told so.

What then are the Brazilian bishops doing? They are enunciating a law of the Church, as universally known as the Apostles' Creed, from the pulpit and the press. They call only the arms of logic and expostulation. They interfere with no man's belief. They are guarding the spiritual interests of the flocks committed to their care. How are they met—by counter-arguments, by legitimate controversy, by the intelligent contrast of opinion with opinion? Not at all. They are answered by tumult, violence and murder! The Rio Mail Gazette, a London daily paper favorable to Masonry and bitterly antagonistic to Catholicism, describes certain scenes which took place very recently in Pernambuco. A mob of the "free and accepted" incensed at the conduct of the bishops, broke into a Jesuit church, tore the pictures to pieces, smashed the altar furniture, demolished the confessionals, and ended their amusement by assaulting the priests so brutally that one of them subsequently died from his injuries. Recollect, the sole offense of which the priests could possibly have been guilty was that of telling their people not to join the fraternity, because it was opposed to the Church. For daring to announce that which every Mason must acknowledge to be true—for uttering words which are printed every day in the year in Masonic journals—they have been assaulted and assassinated. Very possibly we shall find some feeble condemnation of this ruffianly violence appearing in the organs of the society printed in this country, because it would never do to even seem to countenance it while preaching liberality and toleration; but the fraternity will not trouble themselves much about replacing the property which was destroyed, or about bringing the law to bear upon the savages who murdered the Jesuit Father.

Spirit of freedom and liberty of conscience must be nicely understood in a country where an assertion that no Catholic ought to join the Masonic association, because it is forbidden by the Church, is answered riot and bloodshed. We can hardly comprehend the casuistry by which such a statement can be construed into any attack at all upon the fraternity. There was nothing published to the members which they do not most freely and unreservedly acknowledge and boast of in all their official journals. The only inference we can draw from the action of the brethren of Pernambuco is that in that locality the lodges think any allusion at all to the Mystic Order, "if made by a Catholic priest, is an offense properly punishable with death. Here, thank God, things have not yet reached that pitch, yet there is a paper published in this city, having, we believe, no official connection with the fraternity, though purporting to speak on its behalf, which occasionally threatens terrible things if "unbelievers" are not spoken of more courteously. Catholics are not by any means so deeply interested in "unbelievers" as the said "unbelievers" affect to believe, having quite sufficient to do to look after their own spiritual and temporal welfare. And we fearlessly assert that the discourses delivered in Catholic pulpits certain far less frequently to these outside the pale of the Church, than the "sermons" preached in Protestant pulpits relate to Catholics and Catholicism. In fact, there is no class of men in the community who more strictly "mind their own business," or more carefully refrain from speaking of matters not of their faith, than our clergymen. At the same time they certainly must continue to teach their own doctrines to their own flocks, even at the risk of violence like that at Pernambuco.

IS CHRISTIANITY SECTARIAN?

Day after day in this age of progress the ideas of men respecting religion and morality are getting looser and more indefinite. It is hard indeed to confine belief in any doctrine of revealed religion without incurring the terrible charge of "sectarianism." Yet we did not think that the revolutionary faith was carried to the extreme of stigmatizing the mention of the name of the Redeemer as an act of illiberality, but we find it has actually come to that.

There was an Odd Fellows' Hall recently "dedicated" at Visalia, and in the ceremonies a "chaplain" had something to do, probably to offer up a prayer on behalf of the new Temple of Secrecy. In the course of his remarks he, according to the Visalia Delta, "said something about Jesus Christ." When he had concluded he was sternly called to order by the presiding officer, who reminded him that the institution was not a "sectarian" one. The result was, he declared, were Christians, Jews, Turks, and many of them were what was called infidels. Therefore the cause of Jesus Christ as the Redeemer was not a cause for offense against the genius of the Order." It should be omitted on all occasions as should everything else that savored of sectarianism!

We do not know to what particular denomination the offending clergyman belonged, only we know very well he was not a Catholic priest; but if he had the faintest reverence in his soul for Christianity, he must have been shocked at the reproof he received. We suppose that if an atheist were present, the presiding officer would not have allowed his feelings to be hurt even by the most delicate allusion to the existence of Almighty God! Yet some Catholics will wonder why the Church discountenances such societies and characterizes their influence as injurious to religion. Christianity has now been denounced as sectarian; infidelity, however, is not sectarian, for all believers in the Gospel must allow themselves to be dragged down to its level.

CREDIBILITY OF THE BIBLE.

We have noticed a very interesting letter in one of the San Francisco papers written by the mother of a girl attending some one of the Protestant Sunday Schools, who complained that a teacher, reading to her pupils the account of our Lord's fasting in the desert, asserted it could not be true that the Redeemer had gone forty days without food; that it was impossible for any human being to live so long without sustenance, and that consequently the story was not to be believed, but set down as a fable. The writer of the letter said that previous to the delivery of the instruction her little girl had had every reverence for the Bible, and implicitly believed its contents, but ever since she has been progressing towards utter skepticism. We sympathize with the mother, although we do not think, looking at affairs from her own religious standpoint, she has much right to complain. The freethinking teacher only exercised her sovereign right of private judgment, as guaranteed to her by the Constitution of her Church; and if she thought the account of our Lord's fast irreconcilable with modern science," she had a perfect right to say so. Now, liberality has made such progress among the sects that the fundamental truths of Christianity are held to be of very little account, and a man or a woman may believe or reject them, without ceasing to be "a good Church member", or being thought anything the worse of by those who sit under the same pastor. The only Church that requires unity of belief among its members is the Catholic.

THE NOMINEES.

At the date of our last review of the political situation, the clouds that lowered upon the Democratic camp were fast melting into thin air; but they have combined again, and now look more ominous than ever. The conference committee appointed by the Municipal and Legislative Conventions to arrange a compromise, instead of bringing the two parties more closely together, have actually widened the breach, and for this we think the Councilmen of the Municipal Convention are chiefly to blame. The offer of the Legislative Convention to rescind its nominations and leave the two Conventions to agree and nominate a ticket, was met by the conference committee of the Municipal Convention with a positive refusal to concede anything. Thereupon the Legislature went to work and placed independent nominees in the field, and now we have the agreeable spectacle of two full-fledged Democratic tickets, each claiming virtually to be the election to their opponents. Were they united, the Democracy could sweep San Francisco; but divided as they are, the Republicans will probably elect. Here, thank God, things have not yet reached that pitch, yet there is a paper published in this city, having, we believe, no official connection with the Democratic party, purporting to speak on its behalf, which occasionally threatens terrible things if "unbelievers" are not spoken of more courteously. Catholics are not by any means so deeply interested in "unbelievers" as the said "unbelievers" affect to believe, having quite sufficient to do to look after their own spiritual and temporal welfare. ## Grand Hurdle Races.

Mr. Baxter has been completely successful in his spirited endeavor to introduce the sport of the Old Country into California. As a general thing Irishmen look upon trotting matches as very tame and uninteresting affairs, hardly worth walking a rod to see, and consequently, except upon some more than ordinary inducement, they do not patronize them. And, indeed, it must be confessed that the spectacle of a couple of horses trotting round a mile or half-mile track is but poor amusement to men who have witnessed one of the grand steeple chases which are so frequent in Ireland. The sight of a dozen or more splendid animals, bearing their brilliantly-costumed jockeys, rushing at a "scraper," nobody knowing how many of them may be down in a moment, is one of the sights that stir the blood in a "graven image" as Artemus Ward, would say, if it only had any. In fact, steeple-chasing is the national sport of Old Erin, and wherever the Celt wanders he cherishes affectionate remembrances of it. Mr. Baxter's efforts are to be seconded in the most enthusiastic way by the proprietors of the very best horses on the coast, so he will be able to give us, on the 30th of September, a day of exciting amusement. An advertisement, appearing in another page, gives full particulars as to how the track is to be reached. We feel certain that we will see there all the elite of the city, and that, if the success on this occasion that has not been equaled at any race since California became a State. And we have not the remotest doubt that every Irish manly woman who remembers the life, hustle and fun such meetings called forth at home, will be there if at all possible. To the Editor of The Monitor—Sir: The congregation of St. Patrick's Church were most agreeably surprised on Sunday evening last by receiving a musical treat such as seldom enjoyed on such occasion. Immediately after Vespers, and before Benediction, there peeled forth from the choir a voice, the most lovely I have ever had the happiness to hear in that grand auditorium. The large congregation became, as it were, spell-bound by the breath of notes of any kind could be heard but the sweet tone of that angelic voice until the ceremony was over. I could not refrain from inquiring who the lady was to whom the good Father had given the congregation were indebted, and found to my surprise that she was a young Miss Sarah Fitzgibbon, a pupil of the School of the Holy Cross of Santa Cruz, now on a visit in this city. I was told Miss Fitzgibbon would pay many visits of the same kind to Saint Patrick's. The good Sisters of the school of the Holy Cross have reason to be proud of the efforts in educating singing to the performance Miss Fitzgibbon has attained under their instruction.

SAN FRANCISCO, August 20.

To the Editor of The Monitor—About a month ago a man requested me to give him my name, as he was to come again for religious purpose. I gave it to him, and upon a blank paper that he had handy, without suspecting any other intent. As I had remarked that the paper was folded, I requested him, some days after, to show me the paper for "prudence" sake—and I repeated my request. As that gentleman did not condescend to give me the satisfaction I considered of becoming honesty, I take the liberty respectfully to caution the public of the many questions that may arise in connection of my name for any purpose or business. I found without the ordinary lawful and cautious modes of signature, whatever good or bad (at the request of some one) may result in this matter. Honesty first, respect for a man's rights and name, but cease confidence when evil intent can in "one smart." Respectfully yours,

A Methodist Paper on the Catholic View of Education.

The St. Louis Christian Advocate, commenting upon an address of Bishop Ryland, Principal of the Christian Brothers, on Education, says:

Well, there it is now; what of it? It tells us that Catholics are opposed to the American system of common schools; a fact which might easily have been known and read of all men for years past. So far as we know, they never tried to conceal their opposition to our school system. It tells us that Catholics are forced to pay for the support of schools which their consciences will not allow them to use, and this also has been proclaimed through the length and breadth of the land for years past.

Nothing new in this. It tells us further that persons have sent to Ireland in order to induce young men to come to this country and engage in the work of preaching. And what of that? Catholics believe they are right, and labor to propagate their particular doctrines. We send missionaries to Catholic countries, and Catholics send missionaries to Protestant countries. The Protestants in France, Italy and other countries where they are greatly in minority, desire help from abroad, and so far as this is concerned where is the difference?

"Still but Catholics are opposed to some of the institutions of this country." No doubt they are; and Protestants are opposed to the law of polygamy, the law of Catholic countries. "But Catholics would break up our system of schools." Yes, we believe they would, and Protestants, or many of them, would break down their system of papacy if they were in power. This is Popery, that's the very question in dispute. Catholics believe that every Irish man and woman who remembers the life, hustle and fun such meetings called forth at home, will be there if at all possible. ## A Rabid Orator.

The Orangemen of a large portion of the counties of Down and Armagh celebrated the Twelfth by a demonstration at Banbridge. The speech of Mr. T. E. Peel, of Armagh, is so rich in the way that we cannot refrain from condensing it as the best joke of the season.

After upbraiding the Protestants for refusing to join the institution, he went on to say that "Orangeism was a liberal institution; it was an institution in which all Protestants could meet to resist the encroachmen t of the Catholics and agents of disloyalty, the form no small portion of the populace of this country, and to prevent the dismemberment of the Empire, which alone he had referred to wanted to overthrow. Some people said disloyalty was going out in this country, but there were many disloyal people still in Ireland. They had a new phenomenon known as Home Rule, which, by whatever specious name it might be called, was the same movement and revolution agitated by Smith O'Brien and "Dan," and meant nothing more nor less than the repeal of the Union, and the dismemberment of the country, to prevent which was one of the great objects of the Orange institution. It was said that the Catholic Church was an infallible Church and never changed; but he maintained that it did, for at one time a Pope of Rome boiled the seven sons of Sir Hugh Lane, sons and lads, to an English monarch, Henry the Second, for the payment of a penny a bower; but now Catholics were using every means to sever Ireland from England, and rid themselves of British rule; but the Orangemen would resist to the last. There was a remnant of them together, Catholics and they meant no harm to Protestants; but why were Protestant landlords shot, and why were pikes and revolvers concealed in Cork and other places if they did not mean to do harm to Protestants? But let Orangemen know what they would do with a permanent viceroy.

The struggle in regard to education in this country will be a fierce and fearful one. You may depend on it. No child's play will characterize it. Words of fire and blood will be used for all the cool deliberation, the caution, the care, the foresight and wisdom that can be commanded. We look towards the future, and not distant fatten ing, but painful nourishment. Men are prone to yield themselves to the impulses of blind passions, unjustifiable prejudice, and to be guided by those when a good conscience and sound reason alone should govern. And when it comes to such as this question is concerned, we look in the future with anxiety.

What is right, what is fair, what is true, what is good, should be, and if we address ourselves to it in a proper manner will be as on every other subject. We should look at it calmly and discuss it in all soberness and candor.

It would be useless to deny that there is in the public mind a widespread feeling of dissatisfaction in regard to the existing system of public schools. The superintendent of schools in Alameda County alluded to this in his last annual report. The Legislature has also taken some action in the matter. Unless we have been misinformed, Assemblyman has been openly expressed in the Annual Convention of Sunday schools lately held in this city, when at least ten thousand children were present, that the views of large experience and education stated that they felt compelled either to teach their children themselves, or to send them to Catholic schools, as there were no other schools in existence where they could conscientiously patronize.

The circular above, and the Catholic generally, are not content with a right to schools as "godless schools, but heads of vice and immorality," etc. This is, perhaps, a little too strong. There is much in the city, where we spend nearly a million dollars annually on our schools, that we can only mourn over. We should say that many of the teachers are not competent, worthy, faithful, and even moral. But we do not deny that many others of these teachers are more than competent in learning, leading in philosophy, and "free thinkers," or infidels in religion. We need not seek to ignore these things. They will not down at our bidding." They will come up—will be recognized and dared the discussed, and the more candidly and honestly we act in this and discuss them, the better it will be.

The Catholic party prefers that such schools, and needs to be revised that everything inconsistent with truth, justice and fairness should be done to relieve the minds and feelings of all concerned. No body of religionists, or any other class of men are disciplined, and the disquietude that now exists will cause danger increasingly. Then the status quo and a more equitable one. We expect to perform our part, whatever it may be, in the discussion of this subject, and in this, as in other matters, will be glad to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God."

Singular Protestantism.

The Rev. Dr. Hassard, late Protestant rector of Rathbeale, and Chancellor of the diocese of Limerick for over twenty years, who resigned his rectory some twelve months ago, on conscientious grounds, a gentleman, who had attained an advanced age, was a member of the Hassard family of Skea, in the county Fermanagh, for generations identified with the Roman Catholic city of this county, when the latter had few friends among the Protestants of the country. The Hassards were always great liberals, and being a sporting family they had a celebrated mare called "Papal Kate," which they spared at many a steeple-chase against another celebrity of the day, "Protestant Boy," the property of a Mr. Nixon, a well-known member of the turf, and a Grand Master of the Orangemen. The contests between the two animals of course led to many a feud between the Catholics and Orangemen, chiefly the latter, where the races came off. "Papist Kate" belonged to the father of the reverend gentleman whose decease has just taken place, and "Protestant Boy" belonged to the father of Captain Alexander Nixon, who was also a liberal, and a sporting character in his way. The Hassard family, in addition to their liberality, were thoroughly Irish, though of different political views. Dr. Hassard being a liberal, received the offer of Rathbeale when Lord John Russell was Premier and the Earl of Clarendon Viceroy. His death will recall recollections of many stirring scenes in Fermanagh, Tyrone and Cavan, where the family estates were situated. Dr. Hassard, in addition to being a deep scholar, was a refined and courteous gentleman.—Cork Herald.

Re-ception of Converts.

The Charleston (S.C.) News contains the following account of the reception of ten converts into the Catholic Church:

"A very large congregation attended the Cathedral Chapel last evening to witness the baptism of a number of converts, who had been instructed in the Protestant faith themselves to the Roman Catholic church. The ceremonies began at half-seven o'clock. The converts, ten in number, stood at the foot of the altar. Immediately in their rear, and within the sanctuary rail, were seated their sponsors. The following are the names of those who were baptised: Mary S. Peth, Elies Vey, Mrs. O'Brien, Mary Johnson, Anna Jolee, Miss C. Woods, Sarah Smith, Caroline A. Farmer, William H. Harrelson, James Lofton, and Samuel Johnson. One child, Miss Joseph Woodruff, was also baptised. The sacrament of baptism was administered by the Rev. D. J. Quigley, assisted by the Rev. A. M. Folchi. While the ceremonies were progressing, the Rev. Father Van Antwerp, the spiritual director of the convent, explained the nature of the rite and the meaning of the ceremonies, after which, who died but a few years ago. The eldest of the converts, a man of middle age, rose and addressing every convert by name, inquired, 'Do you ask of the Church of God?' The answer being 'Faith.' The inquiry was then asked, 'What does bring thee to?' Answer, 'Life everlast.' The priest then breathed upon each convert and made the sign of the cross on each one's forehead and breast. Then followed a series of short prayers; after which the salt of wisdom (unless superstition) was placed upon the lips of the neophytes, the priest, as he placed it there, saying 'Receive the salt of wisdom that it may be to thee a propitiation unto life everlasting.' The stole of the clergyman, an emblem of his authority, was then placed upon the shoulders of the candidates, each one in turn, after which the neophytes made profession of their faith by repeating the Apostles' Creed, the questions and responses joining in. After this followed the examination of the candidates and the anointing with the sacred oil. The priest having changed his position in the sanctuary baptized each person with water. The baptismal ceremonies were concluded by the solemn anointed with the holy chrism, which ended the ceremonies.

TELEGRAPHIC JOTTINGS.

Colonel James A. Moline, the well-known journalist and author, died in Brooklyn on the 16th.

There is no truth in the dispatch to the effect that Count Jules Arnaud, reporting the capture of Berga.

The report in the Paris papers that Metz will be restored to France, through the influence of Russia, is denied.

One thousand insurgent refugees from Valencia have landed on the coast of Algeria, and are being sent into the towns.

Six tons of gold coin have been safely transported by the Treasury officials from San Francisco to the New York sub-Treasury.

It is believed that the Iron-clads Atlanta and Onondaga will be ready for service in the harbor of New York next week.

Cartagena is preparing for a long struggle. All males from 18 years of age are enrolled. The streets are almost deserted, and business is suspended. The insurgents are in force.

Five British, one American and three Italian vessels-of-war are in Smyrna Bay last week. Three insurgent vessels are in the Piraeus. Two Austrian vessels-of-war have arrived. A few shots were exchanged, without apparent effect.

The principal topic of interest from Paris up to the 6th ult., was the Duke de Broglie's speech, which was received as a report when the measure would pass which the Duke declared would be a terror to evil-doers, whether Femians, Communists, or any other name Catholic associations choose to call themselves. They would keep them in their proper places, and above that they must be bearers of wood and drawers of water. There was nothing said as a governing race, and the Orangemen were such a race. They had bullets and bands, and so long as they lasted worthy of their calling and they would know how to use them, and need have no fear Fenian or other traitor or disloyal characters."

All the other speeches were mod rate, and the general sentiment was favorable to that of Mr. Peel. In fact, the day is deemed to have been regarded rather as a holiday than as an anniversary. Everything points to the speedy downfall of this silly, puerile mummery.

Irish Professional Incomes.

In the recent inquiry into the condition of the Civil Service in Ireland, it was natural that there should be much reference to the incomes obtained by professional men. One of the witnesses examined, Dr. E. Kennedy, stated that in Dublin a competent physician, with a large practice, and a large population, the leading medical men usually make from £1,200 to £2,000 a year. Sir J. Corrigan, who was also examined, thinks there are, perhaps, ten or twelve medical men in Dublin making from £2,000 to £5,000 a year or more; and there are "many," whose names are not very prominent before the public, who make as much as £1,000 a year. There are several practitioners in Dublin who make £3,000. They will come up—will be recognized and dared the discussed, and the more candidly and honestly we act in this and discuss them, the better it will be.

The Catholic party prefers that such schools, and needs to be revised that everything inconsistent with truth, justice and fairness should be done to relieve the minds and feelings of all concerned. ## ROSABEL OF ROSS.

BY SAMUEL FERGUSON.

PART FOURTH.—(Concluded.)

Nickol turned his face from one to the other with an expression of rage, rendered almost abortive by shame. "Get to your chamber!" he at last vociferated to his daughter. "And do you, maidam, spare me your good wishes till I ask for them," he stammered, turning to the lady.

"Indeed I cannot choose but pity you, Master Davys," replied Lady Anna.

"Madam," cried Nickol passionately, "if you know how I am situated, you would see that I have no choice!"

"How," replied the lady, "if I promise you, on the word of a gentlewoman, to bestow thrice as great a reward upon you, what is there to prevent your giving me the liberty of which you know that I am wrongfully deprived?"

"And, madam, if you had your liberty, what use could you make of it?"

"Return and comfort Lady Rosbel in her affliction."

"Madam, the door of your mother-in-law's house would be shut against you."

"What mean you, Master Davys?"

"Master Richard, madam, tells me that Sir Gilbert is not more enraged against the monk than my Lady Rosbel asked against the Irish lord who was found hidden in your chamber."

"Now, may the sweet saints have pity on me!" cried the unfortunate lady, clasping her hands; "if her good opinion be gone, I am lost indeed!"

"Oh, madam, oh, my lady, my dear mistress," exclaimed Judith in equal anguish, "you know it was my duty; let the blame fall on me! Father, it was I who gave the disguised Irish gentlemen the key to conceal themselves there in case of danger. —Lady Anna knew no more of their being hidden there than you yourself. If Richard has had the baseness to turn that innocent accident to my young lady's disfavour with her own people, he is the falsest, the blackest—oh! he is the most accursed villain that ever God sent to plague this weary world!" and she burst into tears of anger and vexation.

Nickol looked at both with an air of utter incredulity; okeys, concealment, disguise—fiddle-faddle!" he muttered; "I don't believe a word you say. It is your own invention all, and I was a fool to listen to you so long." It was easy, from the insolence of his tone, that the belief in the misconduct of Judith received a great relief to his own condemnation of himself. "What!" cried he, "you have your intrigues and your plots, and you forge lies by the dozen to excuse yourselves, and then you raise a clamour about virtue and honour and what not, when a man but obeys the lawful orders of his master. I tell you, I will hear no more reproaches; but I will keep you here as I promised, till Sir Gilbert himself comes to answer to order your release, and there's an end of it." Judith had turned away in the bitterness of vexation, and Lady Anna retired in disgust.

It was now clear that their captivity must be submitted to until terminated by some other means than any influence they could hope to exert on their jailor. Nickol having once experienced the advantage of an offensive attitude, stood ever after upon his equality, and did not scruple to repel any symptome of reproach by broad recrimination. Judith stormed and fretted, and Lady Anna, from indignant distress, gradually settled into a quiet melancholy. At night when the air was clear, even though the warmth of the season fire scarce overcame the chilliness of the sea-breeze, she was accustomed to sit on the platform of the tower under the shelter of the seaward battlements, gazing upon the stars for hours at a time. Judith would sometimes creep to her side and intercept her reveries. "Dear lady, do you think there are people in the stars?"

"Alas, Judith, I was not thinking of the stars."

"And, indeed, my lady, neither was I; you would hardly guess what I was thinking of."

"Of your lover; for I fancy, Judith, you think of little else."

"Well, I confess it was; and the sweet saints be thanked for it, the surer I am that it was Master Bonnell whom we saw that morning on the deck of the galley. Depend upon it, my lady, Sir Gilbert will be brought to your door some morning on his knees, and we will be happy yet."

"May you prove the truth of your own prophecy," said Lady Anna with a deep sigh; "but I will never be happy in this world again."

"And why should you not, my lady? Sure his remorse for this fault will only make him the more anxious to please you after you are reconciled?"

"If I had been the will of God, I wish I had taken the well when my aunt wished me," said the lady speaking aloud, almost unconsciously.

"Taken the well! God forbid!" cried Judith; "I would say, if it had been the will of God, I would rather that you and I, my lady, had been born somewhere in the Irish country, and that you had been a battlerns, such as Donnell has often told me about, and I to have the princes and princesses to foster."

Lady Anna sighed again, and but that the red light of the beacon shone so strongly upon her cheek, Judith would have said that she blushed. "It is a shocking thing to be married to a jealous man, surely," she continued, emboldened by having been permitted to go so far, "and after what he has done it would be but asking to get rid of—"

"What did you say, Judith?" asked Lady Anna quickly.

"Oh Lord, my lady, nothing but that if I were you, I would have another choice—is, my dear lady, forgive me, you know hope of an giddy girl," she cried, for she saw the large tears bursting from Lady Anna's eyes, "indeed I cannot imagine what put such thoughts into my head at all; but you know, my lady, that if Sir Gilbert should be drowned, or if he should die of the wounde he got that night wrecking the friary, or if——"

"Judith," said Lady Anna, "I forgive you because you cannot understand me; but I will try to tell you what I feel, that you may never have to ask me to forgive you for such a fault again. Whatever love the breast of a woman, who has not been a mother, can bestow upon a man, I lavished on my husband; I love him still, but it is against my better judgment, for I blush to think that I can find no excuse for his unimaginable baseness towards me. I was all confidence; he had, I may truly say it, my whole heart. And what did he give me in return?—suspicion, insult, indignity! And yet all the human affections that I have, still cling to his image in my breast. But those affections, oh, how they are altered from their original state! No love were better than the discordant mixture of love and anger, of compassion and scorn, of—attachment and aversion that constitutes my feeling towards that unhappy man. But, Judith, although the fountain of my human affections is thus hopelessly troubled, I found in solitude and sorrow another source of happiness, which, if my soul deceives me not, will never run dry—which bears with but make purer, and affliction more abounding. I have spent more time in my chamber since I came to this place of trial, and let me hope of purification, than I had devoted to that duty for many, many months before. Meanwhile Judith, with noiseless steps, had crept into his apartment and bidden herself in the deep window on which her own hands had, scarce herself in her narrow nook, when her father and the steward entered. "You have ridden hard, Richard," said Nickol, placing him a chair.

"Not without good reason, by——," replied the ruffian, with an oath, as he drew his hand across his brow, and seated himself opposite the trembling listener, who thought she had never beheld such a countenance. Master Richard's customary appearance had been that of a careful, discreet, persuasive, soberly, but well clad, and never wearing anything that approached the character of an offensive weapon nearer than a modest dagger. He was now rather richly dressed and armed like a cavalier, but it was his countenance and manner which exhibited the most remarkable change, for instead of the humble deferential air and address which formerly won the encomiums of the approving burghers of Ross, his dark gleaming eye and knit brow were charged with confidence, and his voice was loud and commanding. He swallowed down two cupsful from the wine flask which Nickol set before him, and looking his confederate full in the face, said, "What think you brought me here to-night?"

"I cannot tell, farther than that you are welcome; perhaps you have brought me the money you promised me."

"I have brought you no money; but I have brought you news that may be better than ten thousand marks to you."

"Tell it then, in God's name."

"Hear it in the devil's name," cried Richard. "Gilbert and his brothers will be here to-morrow!"

"Ha!" cried Nickol, starting up and sitting down again in considerable agitation, "if it be indeed—but I can scarce believe it—they could never have got their pardons from the Church so soon."

"It is true, nevertheless," replied Richard, swallowing another cup of wine, "and I have ridden since before noon to tell you."

"By my word, Richard, I am much your debtor; it was kind of you; very kind; I must lose no time in preparing for their reception—but, my God, I never thought to see them back so soon; yes, yes, I must make everything ready."

"Have you the flag-staff hoisted?" asked Richard with a very peculiar smile.

"It is; and the banner at hand ready to be displayed whenever they heave into sight."

"It is well that you have the staff up at all events," said Richard in deliberation, "for Gilbert has sworn by his father's head to hang you over your own battlements before he is an hour on shore!"

"Hang me?" cried Nickol in a tone of voice closely approaching to a shriek, as he jumped to his feet and stared his companion in the face. "My God, Richard, what do you mean?"

"I mean," replied Richard in the same deliberate tones, "that Gilbert has sworn a solemn oath upon the sacrament to hang you by the neck over the battlements of Rock, and me over the parapet of Rosabel's Court, as a warning to all the knaves in Leinster, before the clocks beat four in the morning."

During the reading of the above letter Nickol's voice and countenance underwent all the changes indicative of astonishment, incredulity, trembling expectancy and prostrate submission to the will of the superior mind. Master Richard, as his design became developed, seemed to grow unwillingly in the consciousness of consummate and unapproachable villany. "Richard," cried Nickol, as he laid down the paper, "this is a strange business you have played a bolder game than I gave you the credit for; but our last stake was down now, and we must do or die to save ourselves from ruin I cannot tell."

"But I can," replied Richard, with a glance of complacent superiority, "and your galley shall never bring her crew to shore alive!—but what my plan is that?—are you sure we are alone?"

"God preserves us, Richard—I—I am afraid to listen to you; but you may speak without fear of anybody overhearing you—it was a rat you heard in the window; the place is swarming with them; I heard one rustling in the folds of the curtain all the time I was reading the latter part of the letter."

"I—I—your rats!" cried Richard, fiercely, "it is about life and death I came to talk with you, not about rats, and it was concluded they had been thrown into the river with the others. I repeat of the same myself and considered them well out of my way. I have already told you of the curses pronounced against the murderers, in which your own name was not forgotten."

"Aye, cried Nickol, "you took good care to leave all the work and the danger to us; if I had kept my hand clear as you did, I would not be sitting here now, I promise you—but you have me in your power, you have me in your power—go on."

"Tut, Nickol! I would take no advantage of a friend—besides, you have my secret, which is more than any other living man can say; and by my baptism, Nickol, I will prove it worth ten thousand marks to you yet, if you but stand by me like a true friend to-night."

"Why, what would you do?" asked Davys with a stammering conclusion of some most guilty proposal being about to be made to him.

"Hear out my story and I will tell you," Richard replied. "You must know I wished, Nickol, to get these brothers out of my way—for that purpose I found it expedient to send certain messengers to Rome, who followed close in their track; and to one of them I give in charge in case he should overtake them to give me timely advertisement of their proceedings. Now, being in Waterford this morning, I had a packet put into my hands by a sea-captain who had just landed from Bordeaux. I make no secrets with you, Nickol; you are my friend—there is the letter; read it!"

"Will be the portion of a certain fair widow before morning!" said Richard, with a smile of such diabolical import that Nickol started to his feet and exclaimed—

"Ha! Kenny, I would know that voice, Way, Judith, no traitress death!"—and in another instant the captives were free.

"I am happier than if I had set Ireland in my arms," cried Bonnell, clasping his recovered treasure; "but ochon o right ochon o right the lieuba is no more!"

"And the knight," gasped Lady Anna.

"Is safe enough, together, Heathcraw Sy'rah bet was swept overboard first, and the Turra Ogs, that had ventured over the side, in the presence of his faithful parishioners, renewed his sacredeal vows of obedience to the Holy Father, Supreme Doctor of the Church, and to his lawful bishop, after which the young communicants repeated together: 'We also will remain faithful until death to the faith of our fathers; we will live and die as faithful children of the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Church.' And priest and people then retired the Vienna Exhibition Hungary has sent a thousand florins for the persecuted New Zealand, and has published, together with a letter to the Bishop of Hale, a pastoral ordering collections for this purpose throughout his diocese; and Mgr. Mahon, who set the example of these collections in Hungary, writes to the Gazette Jarnal strene that, if the persecution laws, he will be the first at the doors of the Vienna Exhibition for the priests of his native land. The Pastoral issued by the Burmese Government to a state of absolute destitution.—London Times, July 26.

"WHERE THE GRASS GROWS GREEN."

From dear old Ireland far away
Ye list'ners weary years,
But many a time, on many a day,
I've heard your voices cheer,
In dreadful toils ye toiled amain
For bread, for hope, for home,
Where the miserable streams run brightly
And the grass grows green.

Full many an heir of pure delight
In that dear land I spent;
Full many a day and night
Ye've watched by me content.
For well I know, of true hearts true
Of friends who ne'er deceive,
Were lords of dear old Ireland,
Where the grass grows green.

So, parly to my country's cause
I gave both hand and heart;
And I think I was a friend she was,
Such a true man's part;
With all my soul and all my heart
I serve my dear Ireland,
I serve for dear Ireland,
Where the grass grows green.

For all my cards and cards still—
They look as good as ever,
The right hand and the left as well—
They're bright and perfect, too,
And I'll play them for Ireland,
For I've sailed long I've been,
That I'll play them for Ireland,
Where the grass grows green.

There is a sad, yet beautiful, song about this. These verses, adapted to the same air, may be interesting to all who may prefer Irish to Italian.

Persons at a distance may be TREATED AT HOME by addressing DR. GIBBON, with a full statement of their case, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicines sent by express, free from observation, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use. This is an advantage to persons residing in the country, as they can have the remedies sent them by express, and avoid the expense of a journey to make the change, and how so many cases are treated by mail. Persons writing for advice in chronic diseases, would do well to consult the list of questions published in the Dispensary Circular, and answer as full as possible. Those who cannot do so conveniently can be examined personally or by letter, as they prefer. Medicines sent to any part of the country, secure from observation. Consultation and advice free. Call or address DR. GIBBON, No. 653 Kearny street, cor. Commercial, San Francisco. Take the Webb Close House.—S. F. News.

When the Empress Eugenie was in Egypt the Khedive presented her with the same tree beneath which, according to tradition, the Blessed Virgin and the Infant, with the Child, rested during their flight into Egypt. On the feast of the Sacred Heart, Woodstock College, the Provincial House of the Jesuit Fathers in Maryland, was dedicated to the patronage of the Most Sacred Heart, and will hereafter be known as "The College of the Sacred Heart." "A league of Saint Sebastian" is the name of a temporary organization in Ireland to imitate the example of France by devoting one day in the season to a pilgrimage, in one of the numerous holy wells in the south or west—A pilgrimage at once truly Catholic and truly national. The Rev. J. El Karey, a medical missionary, native of Oswasco, but who received his education in England, has lately discovered at Sablous a record kept by the priest of Shechem of all important events that occurred during their time of office. In this record occurs the following statement, written by Sandfer, the priest of the synagogue in the time of our Saviour: "In the 15th year of my priesthood, and the 4,261st year of the world, Sesne of Nazareth, the son of Mary, was crucified at Jerusalem."

After three hundred years of persecution and insult, the representatives of the Catholic Church of England are treated with recognized in high places. The Mayor of Liverpool was also a guest at the dinner given to the Persian sovereign by the Lord Mayor of that city

A writer in the St. Louis Democrat having said that three German priests, in the last nine years, had given their lives to themselves and become members of the Episcopal Church, the Milwaukee shows that they were first suspended from their functions and were driven into Protestantism by power and the fear of it. The fact that such perverts are invariably "weeds thrown out of the Pope's garden," and that a very bad priest makes a good Protestant minister.

In proof of the change coming over the Anglican Protestants, we see they have organized an Order of the Holy Sacrament, in Brooklyn, N. Y., whose dress will resemble in the Catholic religious Orders. They take vows for three years or for life, at their option.

The Knights of St. Patrick, "an organization whose intellectual and moral line has I fit a charm to Irish society in St. Louis, Mo.," are moving with patriotic impulse to secure a suitable monument to one of the public gardens of that city, in order to keep the hallowed memory of one of Ireland's great sons fresh in the minds of the world's greatest benefactors, "green in their souls."

MINING SUMMARY.

California.

The Amador Ledger says of the 16th say of the the Good Hope mine: "We were shown a few days ago, by Mr. Peters, some very rich rock taken from this mine. Free gold could be seen in the rock. It is said that such rock is plentiful in the mine."

The Butte Record of the 19th says: "On Butte creek, about thirty-three miles from Chico, is a splendid vein of iron ore, which has been tested and found to contain about sixty per cent. of iron of good quality. In connection with this locality there is a large abundance of wood and water, and about two miles distant there is a fine ledge of limestone, with a gradual descent all the way. The vein of ore is only two miles south of the Oregon and Shasta road. There is, therefore, a good road now within two miles of the spot, and there will be very little difficulty in getting this iron ore can be hauled from the mine to the railroad depot at Chico for $4 to $5 per ton."

The Calaveras Chronicle of the 12th says: "We have it that the Second Tunnel, the same Railroad Flat, has been sold to a company of capitalists and that active operations are to be immediately commenced. The Prussian Hill is one of the best ledges in this section of the country, and it wants to develop it into a first-class mine in the way of capital.

Notwithstanding the scarcity of water, Duryea, proprietor of the Chilis Gulch hydraulic, keeps constantly at work. He is now invited and was present at the reception given to the Shah at Guildhall, and at the magnificent feast given by the Prince and Princess of Wales. The Mayor of Liverpool was also a guest at the dinner given to the Persian sovereign by the Lord Mayor of that city

A writer in the St. Louis Democrat having said that three German priests, in the last nine years, had given their lives to themselves and become members of the Episcopal Church, the Milwaukee shows that they were first suspended from their functions and were driven into Protestantism by power and the fear of it. The fact that such perverts are invariably "weeds thrown out of the Pope's garden," and that a very bad priest makes a good Protestant minister.

In proof of the change coming over the Anglican Protestants, we see they have organized an Order of the Holy Sacrament, in Brooklyn, N. Y., whose dress will resemble in the Catholic religious Orders. They wear a close fitting black dress, black cloth shawl, a small black bonnet, with a black crape veil thrown over and extending down the back, a linen collar, and a white cross suspended from the neck. They take vows for three years or for life, at their option.

STOCKTON,
Corner of Weber Avenue and Center Street.

At last come one of a noble name,
By the city restored the wealthiest dame;
In the year, a day, and the hour of noon
Appointed in the charter of the city soon
By the Mayor and Council, and Board of Trade
Was the corner stone of the magnificent Hotel
Of the Yosemite laid with marble and wood,
And I give you my prayers, my friend, my friend," said she,
"That it never may be empty, and always free."
So the poor widow held, as she spoke and said,
The poor blind woman felt a tear drop fall,
Then kissed it and said to the weeping lady,
"I'll pray when they enter, the poorest poor."

OUR SPECIALTIES
COFFEE TEAS & SPICES
OUR COFFEE DEPARTMENT

OFFERS MANY ATTRACTIONS TO LOVERS of this article in its good old fashioned, rich, aromatic state. In purchasing, we always select the finest Coffees in the market, and by the most improved blending and grinding Machinery, discharge a large amount of dust, rigid on and we are enabled to turn out fresh grade hourly, and cannot fail to give the utmost satisfaction.

In grinding, we do not make coarse Coffee in an imperfect condition with every good housekeeper. The old-fashioned and unhealthful method of roasting in hand is, in these progressive days of machinery, generally abandoned—insomuch as the machinery does much better, and never is a source of trouble. The greatest difficulty seems to be that even the best articles of pure Coffee, after being roasted and ground, rapidly loses its aroma, grows flat, and becomes unpalatable.

To avoid this, we have introduced a new method of roasting Coffee by putting it in TIN CANS immediately after roasting and grinding it, before losing any aroma or strength.

The cans are fitted with close covers, which can be removed and replaced at pleasure, so each daily issue is warmed, so that the last ounce will prove as good as the first. Pure, roasted Coffee is so very volatile, that parties ordering paper bags, or even when the utmost care is put paper, its strength and aroma will evaporate, and entirely unsatisfactory result. We therefore state, fair and unpalatable; while Coffee packed in our cans will be sent to our customers at their own door, in the same condition as when leaving and also as the day we which it was roasted.

Our Tea department Java, 31 cents, or 5 lb. cans, $1. Fresh Crushed Sugars, 10 cents, or 5 lb. can, $1. Fresh Ground, Family, 25 cents.

Job Printing Executed Neatly and Cheaply.

THE PUREST PEARL.

Beside the church door, a-weary and lone,
A blind woman sat on the cold door stone:
And a mocker came by, and said, in his scorn,
"Woman, what dost thou sit there for, blind beggar?"
Then she lifted her sightless balls to his face,
And a look of awe on the mocker's grace.
"Have pity on me, kind sir, I pray!
For I am a poor blind girl, they say."

The bells were ringing the hour of prayer,
And among the throng of worshipers there
Were some who were talking of death and the grave:
And the poor blind girl heard what they said.
The poor girl was asking for alms in vain,
When a lady passed by, and dropped in her hand
A piece of silver—the blind girl knew
By the touch and the sound, for her hand not the moon,
And her thanks were lost in the mighty noon.

Then followed a maiden young and fair,
Adorned with clusters of golden hair;
In her every look was the light of love worn—
But ne'er the beggar's more forlorn,
For she knew not the form of the maiden fair,
Nor the look of love that was written there.
But I give you my prayers, my friend, my friend," said she,
"That it never may be empty, and always free."
So the poor widow held, as she spoke and said,
The poor blind woman felt a tear drop fall,
Then kissed it and said to the weeping lady,
"I'll pray when they enter, the poorest poor."

THE Armagh Cathedral.

Since Patrick blessed the first temple raised on Irish soil to the Christian God, no event is recorded in the history of this country more splendid and significant than the ceremony which is fixed to take place on Sunday week at Armagh. On that day the National Cathedral will be dedicated with all the splendor of a sacred observance, employed in her celebrations by the ancient Church. No occurrence of a character at once religious and public can be remembered without the deepest and most solemn emotions; not only among Irishmen but in the breasts of strangers. Application for tickets have come from all parts of the United Kingdom. From Glasgow, Greenock, Liverpool, Manchester and other centers of Scotland and England to watch the Celtic pilgrimage strongly; excursions have been organized, and there is, perhaps, no city in Ireland which will not be largely represented on the occasion. And the impossible that the remains of even those two hierarchies of heroes could have prevented his entrance. But no little trouble was appropriated from the Government.

THE 27TH REGT. ORDERED TO THE IRISH

To leave one hundred men at the long-con tested barrier, and to march to the gate of Ballsbridge, where the Irish force, one of the heroes who had been separated from his own men, had defended all day, and to the gate in company of Frenchmen, against Count de Kniffenin. Twelve O'Mahony (who commanded that Irish army after Colonel Wachop had been incapacitated by a wound) led that dauntless handful into the Mantua gate under a galling fire, and twice, after doing much exception on the Germans who lined the walls, they were obliged to fall back upon his first position. It was after their second charge, about one o'clock in the afternoon, that Count de Revel ordered that the position which the Irish had first suggested—namely, the breaking up of the bridge—be acted on. Accordingly, the one hundred French and Irish, who remained the redoubt, destroyed the works and retreated in the midst of a tremendous fire from Vaudemont's solitary gun. Finally, the Irish made their retreat in a storm of shot and musketry, a precaution which might as well have been taken at ten o'clock in the morning, as at one. The Irish, now reduced to about one half of their original number, fulfilled the order they had received to support their brave companion at the Mantua gate. They had not been marching all day long, and were still on foot were wounded; yet their ardor was not damped by a difficult task, and they quickly pushed them on to chase the German cuirassiers beyond its barriers with spouting.

The Imperialists kept up the conflict latest as Ste. Margaret's gate, and when it finally retired, when, after a conflict of about seven hours, the fate of Cremona was decided by Eugene's advantageous position, which is the triumph of a whole people and the jubilee of a faith which has outlived defeat. There are difficulties of retreat among its marked enough, and sometimes almost fatal; but the Irish would be capable of a conflict with a worse sentiment then even that of bigotry which could feel no friendly interest. The Irish people of to-day will, in these days, when the gifts of intellect and knowledge are turned, like weapons of rebellion, against their Almighty giver, bearing men, whatever their communion, will feel the glorious significance of the fact that the descendants of those who, for centuries, sang thanksgiving and praise to God, and who, in the darkest days of persecution, when to be a priest was to be a martyr, when to be a bishop was to be a confessor, when to be a Catholic was to be a rebel, when to be a Christian was to be a traitor, when to be a man was to be a slave, when to be a woman was to be a prostitute, when to be a child was to be a bastard

If an enemy lay concealed it would make him very uncomfortable."

"What chatter is that in the ranks?" cried a sharp voice.

The speakers looked up. A mounted officer was riding by without having been perceived by the soldiers.

"What is this," he added, "about shelling and artillery practice?"

"It is only that this silly conscript, Major, who was telling me a crotchet that had got into his head," said the Sergeant, much embarrassed.

"What is it?" cried the officer.

"Why, Major, nothing less would serve the turn of young Julius Cæsar here but to get up the guns to the Geisberg, and shell the woods over to squeeze Prussians out of them."

"Was this your idea, young man?" said the Major eagerly.

"It was, mon officier," replied Michel with animation.

But the officer's manner changed suddenly, and he remarked with the sharpness of tone that had characterized his first query, "It is not the business of the ranks to discuss the strategy of the army." So saying he rode off, but muttered at the same time under his breath, "I hope to heaven we shall not have reason to be sorry for not doing something like what this raw youth suggests. And, by the way, the lad looks smart and capable, too."

The Sergeant's party moved on to the town, and before long Michel was free to go to rest in his barrack. Early in the morning he heard the reveillee sounded, and sprang up with the freshness and vigor of youth and health. The scene which met his eyes when he joined his comrades was one not deficient in animation nor in interest for young eyes. The smart French soldiers had extemporized cooking apparatus in the open air. Hundreds of men were engaged in preparing coffee, grilling a bit of meat, poaching eggs got in the neighborhood, or in discussing with good zest and appetite a meal they had already before them. Some had finished the meal; some were yawning while they waited their turn to begin. Here was Claude on an improvised desk of knapsacks with much toil penning a letter to Marie; here was bandy little Charles good naturedly stitching on a button which had got loose on the unlucky form of Edouard. Michel was among the earliest and had abundant leisure to enjoy a scene which to him had all the charm and interest of novelty. While he was in full enjoyment of the bustle that surrounded him there was a sudden loud whir above his head, followed immediately after by a dull, ominous report.

"A shell," exclaimed one of the old soldiers.

"The Prussian-!" was immediately the general cry.

"To arms!" shouted the hoarse voice of the officer from the neighboring streets rang out sharp and clear, while the drums beat out the assemblee. Across the heights towards the Geisberg the note of sudden preparation could be heard. Shell after shell followed in quick succession, and before many had come Michel had an opportunity for the first time of witnessing their deadly work. But there was no time for reflection. He was called to fall into his rank and march to the wall. Near the rampart the order was given to the infantry to scatter, while the artillery piled the few guns that were on the dilapidated fortifications. Michel looked towards the woods and there, up almost from the very point to which he had directed his hand the evening before when he advised shelling the woods, seemed to come a storm of deadly missiles. As yet no man of the enemy was to be seen. Invisible as the sources of a plague or rather under the cover of a cloud or smoke which in fancy might be likened to one of the disease-dropping flocks of which we know something in this country, the artillery of the enemy sent messengers of death into the devoted town. Reply was made by the ancient guns of Weissenbourg, which of course was feeble and ineffective; the field-pieces hurriedly brought to the ramparts were used with better aim and possibly more effect. But of this nothing was certain.

"Why do we not go out and attack the them?" was the discontented cry while the artillery duel was going on.

"Where is the General?" some one asked.

Stroking his gray moustache a grim old veteran answered, "Gone to the north side to look for that very enemy that is leaving these polite cards for him from the south side," pointing to a couple of shells which flew over his head.

"Sergeant," said Michel, address ing his patron Beaunez, "how far does this cha sspot carry?"

"Two thousand metres."

"It is scarcely twelve hundred to that clump of trees which juts out like a spur of the woods."

"Well."

"Men could be hit there from this I should think?"

"Ha-ha, conscript!" laughed the Sergeant, "So you are going to do William Tell as well as Marshal Soult. Would you be able to hit a man at that distance?"

"I have never used a chassepot before. Stay, what is that moving out now?"

"I see nothing."

"May I fire?"

"There are no orders to the contrary. Oh, I see a horseman."

As he spoke Michel raised his rifle, took deliberate aim, and fired Even at the distance it was possible for sharp eyes to see a man in the saddle reel and drop off. Immediately three or four horsemen were seen to spur rapidly out. Michel charged his gun and the foremost horse fell bringing his rider with him; a second followed but now all idea of masking force seemed to be abandoned, and after a troop of horsemen there issued from the shelter of the wood a dark mass of infantry. Fiercer and fiercer thundered the cannon, now belching forth their flame from the height of St. Remy, from which a small outlying picket of French had been driven. Already the walls of the town had begun to crumble and the crazy old gates had fallen in. Under the cover of the terrific fire the Germans pressed on.

"Reserve your fire, mes enfants," cried the sharp voice of Major Lambeau, the officer who had questioned Michel the previous evening, "until you have the beggars close enough to make sure."

Michel, though anxious to try his skill upon the advancing enemy, held his rifle firmly in readiness, but, despite the order of the Major, a straggling shot was heard here and there, the impatient troops not being content to abandon the trump cards which the facility of loading gave them.

"Stop firing, I say," thundered the Major, grumbling to himself, "this is the discipline we have got."

Meantime the enemy advanced. Major Lambeau peering through his spy-glass watched them. Michel was standing near, rifle in hand. In a low tone of voice he heard the Major exclaim to the senior Captain next him, and wish to heaven the General was back. The enemy was nearly left to the woods than our whole force."

"Now then," he cried, as the head of the Bavarian column came within the three hundred yards, "give it to them, my lads, good aim and not too quick." Immediately a hail shower of bullets flew from the town and scattered the enemy. But the advice of the Major was not heeded. The shots were delivered with lightning rapidity, but almost on that account not something of the harmlessness of the lightning. No proper aim was taken, and though the fire through the open ranks of the knapsacks with much toil penning a letter to Marie; here was bandy little Charles good naturedly stitching on a button which had got loose on the unlucky form of Edouard. Michel was among the earliest and had abundant leisure to enjoy a scene which to him had all the charm and interest of novelty. While he was in full enjoyment of the bustle that surrounded him there was a sudden loud whir above his head, followed immediately after by a dull, ominous report.

"A shell," exclaimed one of the old soldiers.

"The Prussian-!" was immediately the general cry.

"To arms!" shouted the hoarse voice of the officer from the neighboring streets rang out sharp and clear, while the drums beat out the assemblee. Across the heights towards the Geisberg the note of sudden preparation could be heard. Shell after shell followed in quick succession, and before many had come Michel had an opportunity for the first time of witnessing their deadly work. But there was no time for reflection... He was called to fall into his rank and march to the wall. Near the rampart the order was given to the infantry to scatter, while the artillery piled the few guns that were on the dilapidated fortifications. Michel looked towards the woods and there, up almost from the very point to which he had directed his hand the evening before when he advised shelling the woods, seemed to come a storm of deadly missiles. As yet no man of the enemy was to be seen. Invisible as the sources of a plague or rather under the cover of a cloud or smoke which in fancy might be likened to one of the disease-dropping flocks of which we know something in this country, the artillery of the enemy sent messengers of death into the devoted town. Reply was made by the ancient guns of Weissenbourg, which of course was feeble and ineffective; the field-pieces hurriedly brought to the ramparts were used with better aim and possibly more effect. But of this nothing was certain.

"Why do we not go out and attack the them?" was the discontented cry while the artillery duel was going on.

"Where is the General?" some one asked.

Stroking his gray moustache a grim old veteran answered, "Gone to the north side to look for that very enemy that is leaving these polite cards for him from the south side," pointing to a couple of shells which flew over his head.

"Sergeant," said Michel, address ing his patron Beaunez, "how far does this cha sspot carry?"

"Two thousand metres."

"It is scarcely twelve hundred to that clump of trees which juts out like a spur of the woods."

"Well."

"Men could be hit there from this I should think?"

"Ha-ha, conscript!" laughed the Sergeant, "So you are going to do William Tell as well as Marshal Soult. Would you be able to hit a man at that distance?"

"I have never used a chassepot before. Stay, what is that moving out now?"

"I see nothing."

"May I fire?"

"There are no orders to the contrary. Oh, I see a horseman."

As he spoke Michel raised his rifle, took deliberate aim, and fired Even at the distance it was possible for sharp eyes to see a man in the saddle reel who think would be your man."

"Do you know the short path across the hill to the Geisberg?"

"Yes, mon General."

"Then that way to Brigadier Le Blanc as fast as possible with this note. Do not get shot if you can help it, but it is even more important you should carry the letter quickly."

The order was not very clear or satisfactory, but Michel, for his sole answer, raised his hand to his kepi, and, with his rifle on his shoulder, darted off with the agility of a deer. The sight of the General's handwriting opened the southern gate for him speedily, and he plunged into the path which led straight across the face of the hill. There were sharp eyes at the other side of the Lauter as well as in Michel's own head, and he had scarcely made a hundred paces when a bullet flew past him.

"Ah, worthy Prussian," said Michel to himself, "I am busy now, but if I had time I think I would make a bullet find you out, even though you are five hundred metres away under the cover of the wood. Swish" whizzed a shell and hurried itself forty or fifty feet in the earth of the slope below, throwing up some of the soil on his uniform.

"Ping" went a bullet and hit a small shrub which he had reached and calculated was about half way. He bressed on, and so he rushed on, his speed barely serving to confuse the aim of the enemy, and enabled him to carry a whole skin behind the breast-work, where the force of Brigadier Le Blanc lay fuming at the delay which let them so long hearken to the music of battle without the opportunity of taking part in.

"So you came across by the hill path?" said the Brigadier, after he had read the letter and given the necessary orders. "Smart fellow. Advance my men; lose no time. Hola," he added, as Michel turned to join the ranks. "Was the journey across the slope lively?"

"They tried to put me very often," was the answer.

"Would you like to try it again?"

"If you order I am ready, Brigadier."

"It is almost a pity for the youngster," muttered the officer to himself, "that it is important the General should know we are on the march." Then he added aloud, "Well, my lad, go over once again as quickly as you can, and tell the General you have delivered his dispatch, and that we are on the way to join him."

"Oui, Brigadier," said Michel, with a salute, and as the officer looked after him he was already on the next level letter of the breastwork and away into the open.

This time he fancied he was about to pass scot free. More than two hundred yards had been already traversed without so much as a bullet flying by. —— the little path between the wood and the slope, however, he observed a group of cavalry, probably the chief officers of the enemy, and soon resolved into horses, men and what?—a cannon. It seemed as if for practice they had resolved to take a shot at the single fleeing object—Michel himself. He could now perceive the point of the gun directed towards the place he was foreseeing. He remembered how the shells, which for the first time he had seen that day, scattered their fragments far and wide, and he understood that to be struck by one was not necessary he should be struck by the actual ball. It was against orders, to walk fire as I came with the dispatch, but I have no orders as to the line of my feet now. Besides, if they fire that gun they may kill or maim me, and then I shall not be able to deliver any message to the General and, after all," it will not take five seconds to have just one shot."

Reflection thus as he ran Michel pulled up suddenly and flung himself upon his face, so as to have as good a look as possible at the enemy. A gunner actually stood at the breech with his hand raised to fire the piece when Michel blazed away. As he leaped to sew the match flung up in the air and the gunner sank backwards to his fall. There was a momentary confusion below, of which Michel took advantage to start at his utmost speed along the pathway. But the artillerymen were quick, and he was little more than half way when the cannon fired. The ball whistled over the rather startling event which took place fallen by the gun the aim was not as steady as usual, and the shell flew high and wide, and so far as Michel was concerned, perfectly harmless. "Shall I try this charming chassepot again?" he thought to himself, loading as he ran. "Why will the men by the gun once more and will afford an easy mark." So saying, he turned, flung himself down again and fired, this time without especial aim. A man was seen to stagger and grasping a comrade, almost drew him down in the fall. Meantime Michel was on his feet and away, but not too rapidly. He was only inside the masonry that sheltered the gate when a shell exploded, some of the fragments of which struck the spot close by his head.

At the other side of the town the noise of conflict still was heard. Michel made his way as rapidly as possible through the streets where already he met fatigue parties bearing the wounded back. As he approached the northern gate he saw that the reinforced French had passed through it driving the enemy, not with standing his superior numbers, before them. There was no longer the hand-to-hand conflict raging. The Bavarians were now a considerable distance away, their presence being marked by the puffs of smoke which in a long steady though somewhat scattered line indicated their fire. Pressing on, the French kept up an incessant discharge, rather too quick to be accurate. On the right the Bavarians' artillery maintained a cannonade, which was but inadequately responded to by that of the French.

Michel dashed through the broken gateway over the ramparts which littered the threshold, past the wounded, whose groans were lost through his haste across the trampled and torn by the feet of contending men and the hoofs of rushing horses, till he reached the slight eminence in which, easily recognizable by his brilliant uniform and plume, stood General Abel Douay.

"Mon General," exclaimed the hardy conscript almost out of breath, "Brigadier Le Blanc has had me his say he is on the march with all his force."

"So you have guns and returned. Brave, mon garçon." Then turning to Major Lambeau, he observed "Le Blanc will be flying with him two thousand; we have nearly five thousand here. These cochons yonder are ten thousand at least; and they probably have as many more in reserve. Long odds, Lambeau, three to one; but it would be a degenerate Frenchman who shrank from that much."

Turning to the troops near him he cried in an encouraging tone, "Steady your fire, mes enfants. In ten minutes we shall have strong reinforcements, and then we shall have such a charge on these rascals over there as shall teach them a lesson they will not soon forget."

To give more point to his words he drew his sword which had hitherto lain undisturbed in its scabbard, and held it aloft as a signal to the line in the direction of the enemy. At the moment a huge piece of shell struck him upon the breast.

"Ah," he cried, "I shall not live to see France's victory," and fell lifeless from his horse.

"Poor fellow," said Major Lambeau, who had rushed hastily to the aid of his fallen chief; one, he has not lived to see France's victory. Pray heaven we have not to say he has been spared the mortification of seeing France's defeat."

This was the requiem France gave to her brave soldier. But it was by foreign hands dug his grave, and the muskets of the enemy pealed the tribute that is paid to courage when it is laid low.

CHAPTER V.

WISSEMBOURG—THE FIGHT.

"Now to avenge him!" said Major Lambeau to those near. "Captain Tonnerre, take three companies to the left. Get behind the hillock and stretch your men well out in open order. See if you can make an impression on the flank of those fellows that are firing from the cover of yonder fence."

Captain Tonnerre, saluting, left the certain moves off with the infantry force, making no return to the fire which fell thick and fast around him. "Now, my lads," cried the Major anxiously, "Le Blanc were enough had taken the command out of my hands."

As he spoke the sounds of an advancing march was heard behind, and soon the vanguard of the force which had come from the Geisberg made its appearance. Shortly after the full form of the Brigadier emerged from the midst of his staff. In a few words Major Lambeau explained to the new comer the events of the morning, the disposition he had made, and the sad occurrence which had just deprived the army of a leader. A shade passed across the brow of the fine old soldier as he heard of the death of General Douay, which settled into a grim expression as if he meant what the Major had a short time before spoken.

"We must be nearly equal to the enemy in numbers!" said the Brigadier impatiently.

The Major shook his head "We are more than half probably of those who have to know the whole extent of our own force, and we do not know what they may have beside."

"Have you telegraphed to the Marshal?"

"Mounted orderlies have been sent to him, but we either have no intelligence, or it has not been sufficiently attended to, take care of, and is not in working order."

"Scarce!" muttered the Brigadier with an accent of despite, "the same thing everywhere. If it were not that our gallant army has the bravery of Paladins we should be defeated by mere blundering. Big we must only make the best of the circumstances. With numbers against us, and yet more likely, as you suggest, to come with force, there is nothing for it but to crush those immediately before us by a bold onset. Ha! there is some wavering on the right of these Bavarians."

"That is the work of brave Tonnerre and the detenu of which I told you."

"Well done, gallant fellows! Now is the time for a rapid advance."

On the 21st ult., an office and solemn High Mass were celebrated for the repose of the soul of the Rev. Michael B. O'Donohue, in the church of the Most Sacred Heart, Donnybrook.

On 31st July, Rev. John Gleeson, of Milwaukee, Wis., departed this life in the forty third year of his age. He was born in Bubber, county Tipperary, Ireland.

Rev. James Mooney, of Atlantic City, Penn., died in that town on 26th July, aged thirty-three years.

Rev. James Lonegan of Fethard, county Tipperary, died on the 8th July, aged ninety-six years.

THE ELECTION.

The agony of the election is over at last. Democrats and Republicans, Dolly Vardens and Taxpayers, Independents and Citizens Union men, are now reposing after their tremendous exertions and awaiting the counting of the ballots. We believe there never was an election in which so many different kinds of tickets were presented to the public. In addition to those properly belonging to the several parties, and containing the names of their candidates, at least twenty compromises or combination lists were put forward in the interests of certain individuals. As a consequence straight tickets were very few, and very far between at the polling places, it being estimated that out of nearly 27,000 ballots cast altogether, scarcely 1,000 were constructed on rigid party principles. The amount of "scratching" done was unprecedentedly large. All the skills in the trouble of the election judges and inspectors, who have more than a million and a half names to call over in the process of counting. It is most likely that the result of the election will not be definitely known before Monday or Tuesday morning. Till then most of the aspirants for office will have to sustain themselves with brilliant expectations. His, however, already conceded that the regular Republican legislative ticket has suffered an overwhelming defeat, the suspicion that it was favorable to the railroad monopolists having been sufficient to ruin its prospects among its own partymen. The issue, admittedly, lies between the Democrats and the so-called Dolly Varden ticketers. The probability seems to be that the Legislature will be divided between them, but it would be difficult now to tell in what proportion. It would be almost foolish to hazard a conjecture as to the character of the municipal ticket returned. The suddenness of the bellow, the destruction of "upsetting" by the hundred or two of ballots, the circumstance that nearly all voters came to the poll with their tickets prepared, combine to render any calculations as to the support given to individual candidates a matter of groundless guessing. The prevailing belief is that Captain McDonald has been elected Mayor over Otto. The struggle between White and McKinlay [illegible] never of the latter. But by far the bitterest and toughest contest was that between Crowley and Cockrill. Into this one the religious element seems we sincerely regret to say, entered largely. From the outset the Democrats and their followers viewed it that their intention of opposing the former because he was a Catholic, although they told the simple truth, the amount of faith possessed by that gentleman was hardly enough to arouse the hostility of the bitterest anti-papal fanatic.

This unprovoked declaration of hostility put many Catholics on their mettle, and determined to support Crowley, though otherwise they would have voted for Cockrill, who is personally an excellent man.

The moral of the election, as we understand it, is that large numbers of citizens have abandoned allegiance to party and will henceforth vote for candidates altogether on their personal merits and their relation to local questions. There was no rioting, and very little drunkenness on the part of the hoodlum element. The arrests made by the police were few and for very trivial causes. In the evening, after the voting was over, an unfortunate shooting affray, which cost a man named Gallagher his life, took place on Sansome street near Sacramento. With the sole exception of this deplorable occurrence, however, the day passed off peaceably.

Ho! for the Grand Races!

Our readers must not by any means forget that the Grand Hurdle and Running Races come off to-day, Saturday, at the Ocean View Driving Park Course. A great crowd is expected, and every exertion has been made to procure quick and direct transit to the ground for the people. There are to be four races, the first of which will start at two o'clock precisely. Special trains will leave the Southern Pacific depot, Market and Valencia streets, at half-past twelve, one, and half-past one o'clock, and the regular half-past two o'clock train will lead passengers in time to witness the hurdle race. The trains will stop at the Industrial School station, whence Captain Foster's coaches will run to the course. Those who prefer driving to the ground will do well to go by Market, Seventeenth and Mission streets and the Mission Road to the macadamized roads. Our last word is, all who care to enjoy a day's sport in the good old home style will turn out to the Ocean View Driving Park Course to-day (Saturday) and get there by two o'clock at the very latest. Verbum sat.

The Place for Groceries. — There is certainly no store in San Francisco where the people can procure better supplies of household groceries than at the store of the Pacific Tea Company, 749 Market street. The Murphy Brothers, who are the proprietors, have made a specialty of buying for ready cash and price themselves so as to give the best value in these lines that can be had either in this city, or indeed on the coast. The large trade of the establishment of their claims will be found in the unvarying and still rapidly increasing custom which they have established.

"NON-SECTARIANISM" IN ENGLAND.

Some of the English newspapers are willing very sensationally about a National School Inspector who forbade the children of a certain educational district to sing "God Save the Queen" because it contained an appeal to the Almighty! The Inspector said it was all right and proper that the pupils should be taught to be loyal and to love their sovereign, but, as the schools were non sectarian, it was wrong to sing an anthem with sectarian doctrines in it. The gentleman, probably, was one of those individuals—rapidly increasing in number, thanks to the freedom of "modern thought"—who either do not believe in the existence of God at all, or else thinks it very foolish to imagine that He pays the slightest attention to the prayers of mere mortals. To his mind, consequently, every allusion to the Deity would be "sectarian," as an allusion to the infallibility of the Pope would be to him

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

IRELAND.

The Census of Wexford.

Although the census was taken two years ago, it is only now that we have the published returns for the important county of Wexford. We should, perhaps, as Irishmen, be thankful for small mercies, built is rather too much to try our patience in the manner practised by the officials of Charlemont House. Before every return has been issued, the time for another numbering of the people will probably have arrived. From the last return we collect the following statistics, which, of course, may not now actually represent the county, as the information on which they are based was collected in April, 1871:

The area of Wexford is little over half a million statute acres, and has a population of 182,699 persons. Fifty years ago, 170,000 people dwelt in Wexford; in 1841 the number had increased to 202,000; and in the thirty years which have run since then, the county has lost 70,000. This is a grave subject for serious consideration. There are four members returned to Parliament—two for the county, and one each for New Ross and the borough of Wexford. There are 7,127 county electors, 641 for the borough, and 240 for New Ross. In workhouses, hospitals, asylums, the county jail, and an industrial school, there are 2,500 persons; there are 145 blind, 43 deaf and dumb, 28 dumb, 255 idiots, 864 lunatics, 1,510 in workhouses, 1,216 receiving out-door relief, and 376 beggars and vagrants. There were 93 vessels engaged in the coasting trade, 71 in fishing, 30 in inland navigation, and 87 in pleasure. In the seven years between '64 and '71 there were 5,900 marriages, 29,466 births, and 18,880 deaths; 18 persons returned themselves as being 90 years old, and 6 as being 95 and under 100. Of 85 wives or husband of 80 married to a wife of 15, one of 70 with a wife of 16, one of 85 with a wife of 21, five of 70 married to wives of 30, one of 80 married to a wife of 30. In the county there were 42,400 males, and 49,900 females unmarried; 18,800 husbands and 18,400 wives, widowers 5,500 and 6,500 widows; two of these widows are only 15, and three of the widowers are under 20. Of the 182,000 persons, 167,500 are Catholics, 11,500 are Protestants, and about 1,000 are returned as Presbyterians, Methodists and "other denominations." There is one woman in the county who speaks only Irish, and 200 persons speak Irish and English—in the two years since last census the total number decreased by 31.—Cattle de Opinion, August 9.

Home Rule.

Saturday last was a gala day with the Home Rulers of Cavan and Tyrone. At Cootehill, at Shercock, at Ardboe, and at Ballieboro', there were demonstrations in furtherance of the national movement which appear to have been of a really imposing character. About twenty thousand persons, on an average, took part in each; and nothing could exceed the enthusiasm which pervaded every one of the vast assemblages. It is needless to say that there was a profuse display of the national colors of red flags and banners bearing patriotic mottoes. The speeches were conceived in a broad, national spirit, and give hope that "the men of the South" will yet rival their heroic ancestors in services to Ireland, albeit in another kind of battlefield. Most important features of all, perhaps, are to be seen in the manner practised by the officials of Charlemont House. Before every return has been issued, the time for another numbering of the people will probably have arrived. From the last return we collect the following statistics, which, of course, may not now actually represent the county, as the information on which they are based was collected in April, 1871:

Resignation of Father Hamill.

On Sunday last, after High Mass, the Most Rev. Dr. Power, Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, was presented by his Clonmel parishioners with a purse containing upwards of 750l sovereigns, on the occasion of his departure from the parish in which he so long and so zealously ministered, to a new and more important sphere of duty. The presentation ceremony was conducted in every direction, long before Mass commenced, by parishioners, all anxious to testify their respect for the beloved pastor in whose elevation they rejoiced, while at the same time they deeply regretted his departure from among them; and from a parish in which he conducted his administrations for a period of over thirty years. The purse was of choice workmanship. The presentation was made by the Mayor, the Right Worshipful Alderman Cantwell, on behalf of the Corporation, and the inhabitants of the town in general.—Weekly Register, Aug. 9.

The Presentation Convent, Dublin.

On Thursday week the beautiful and impressive ceremonial of the reception of three young ladies took place in the chapel of the above magnificent old convent. The young ladies who had the happiness of making this the first solemn of not on their entrance into the religious life (Miss O'Connor, religion, Sister Mary Teresa), daughter of the late J. O'Toole, Esq., Kittangan; Miss Mary McCormack, under the name of Gertrude), daughter of the late J. McCormack, Esq., Dublin; and Miss Hanrahan (in religion, Sister Mary Agnes), daughter of the late W. Brennan, Esq., Woodlands, Carlow, His Eminence Cardinal Cullen officiated, 40,000 females unmarried; 18,800 husbands and 18,400 wives, widowers 5,500 and 6,500 widows; two of these widows are only 15, and three of the widowers are under 20. Of the 182,000 persons, 167,500 are Catholics, 11,500 are Protestants, and about 1,000 are returned as Presbyterians, Methodists and "other denominations." ### Death of Captain Power Lalor.

Died, after a brief illness, at Parry's Hotel, Ballyhilly, near Buttevant, Edward James Power Lalor, Esq., of Long Orchard, in this county, formerly a Captain in her Majesty's First Dragon Guards. A most affectionate husband and parent, a just and generous landlord, a kind employer, and, in patriotism and faith, a true Irishman, his death will be mourned by all who had the pleasure of his acquaintance, and his loss will be deeply felt by the Irish people.—Limerick Reporter and Tipperary Free Press, August 5.

Pastoral of Cardinal Cullen.

On Sunday last a pastoral letter from his Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop was read in all the churches in Dublin. His Eminence directed the observance of a Novena, preparatory to the feast of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin; thanked the people for many acts of piety displayed towards the Holy Father at the recent collection; dwelt upon the evils of intemperance, and urged measures to be taken by his flock to avert the threatened visitation of cholera.—Weekly Register, August 9.

Limerick Breach of Promise Case.

Miss Sheehy, the daughter of a magistrate of Limerick county, has obtained £1,675 damages in an action for breach of promise brought against Mr. Thomas O'Leary. The promise was not denied, but it was pleaded that it had been rescinded. To this the plaintiff replied that there had been a subsequent renewal of the contract. The verdict was received with applause.

ENGLAND.

A Remarkable Lady.

A remarkable lady died recently at Kensington Palace, London. She was the daughter of the second Earl of Arran by Miss Underwood, the daughter of a gentleman of Dublin. In her twenty-sixth year, she was married to a Knight named Baggalie, but after his death, in some few years or so, she dropped the name of Baggalie (which certainly was not a very agreeable one to hear), and assumed, by virtue of King William the Fourth's sign manual, the name of Lucinda Underwood. She must have been gifted with no ordinary powers of attraction, for it appears that she was privately married to the Duke of Sussex, a son of George the Third, and that at a time when she was past her fortieth year, and had yielded up the greater portion of at least the physical charms of youth. The Royal Marriages Act had made it unlawful for her, as it had for the Duke's first wife, to assume the title of his Duchess, but Queen Victoria was so gracious to her uncle as to make his wife a Duchess of Inverness. Britain, and not the Duke of Sussex, is thought of now as a maid of another generation, and as long as the Duke of Sussex's widow lived on to the ripe old age of eighty-four. Her remains were laid beside those of the Duke of Sussex, in the cemetery at Kensal Green.

Hanging in England.

They hanged only two men this week in England; but to balance the neglect no fewer than nine persons are being tried for murder at the West Riding Assizes which opened on Tuesday. Hudson, who was done to death at Derby on Monday for braining his wife, was a sadly uninteresting scoundrel, and went to his doom with almost brutal stolidity. Even the account of the same morning at Aylesbury for stating his wife's throat from ear to ear, died pat, tently, and had the weakness to admit that his crime made him feel "exempt uncomfortable." Calcraft was absent on both occasions—no reference to Sir T. Roske will be tolerated—and it is feared that the system executioner has settled the knot of the neck of his last victim. He suffers dreadfully from erysipelas in the arm; but he still manages to crawl of evenings into the parlor of "The Pig and Whistle," close to the Rosemary Branch bridge, where he smokes the pipe and drains the cheerful glass with a choice set of the local traders men. He is considered a highly respectable inhabitant, at whose door no nuisance has ever lief need to knock twice; and as he pays his rates like a citizen, and goes regularly to church like a Christian, his death will be lamented as a parochial calamity. They have got a new hangman—Marwood by name—in the north; but his style is not considered refined, lacking, as it does, the Calcraftian ease, delicacy and polish of manipulation. However, it is a sound saw that practice makes perfect and the chaplogue lubbing edifiers are likely to be built have enough of that.—Nation, August 9.

"He But His Foot in It."

Mr. Edward Jenkins would have no lawmaker for Dundee were it not for the amusement which he permitted himself sometimes ago in caricaturing and scoffing at the Irish people. It was quite open to Mr. Jenkins to join the band of their revilers, and for his boat to make a laughing-stock of the Irish character and the Catholic faith; but it was rather too much for him to expect that Irishmen would swallow his humble and reward him for his unpudence. He strives to make them appear ridiculous, and then asked their aid towards making himself respectable. He knows them somewhat better now, and non-intelligent though they may be blackguarded in Kinglish pamphlets and pot-houses, it has in their power to make Jenkins to feel very effective chastisement upon their tradesmen. He was very anxious to get "No. Saxon" for, and would have been very glad if Irish Catholics and their "spraiers" would help him to do so right well. But Irishmen will laugh at their simplicity and despise them for their weakness. They will not go out of their way to degrade themselves by aiding his ambition. They could have put him into Parliament, and they can keep him out of it. When he shall have publicly apologized for his published insult to the faith and the patriotism of Ireland, and declares his willingness, not to ridicule, but to assist the Home Rule movement, then will soon be placed under the protectorate of the Pope.

What Napoleon. III Intended.

In an article headed "The Prince Imperial," our contemporary, Catholic Opinion, supplied its readers last week with a piece of news which, to use an American form of expression, would be "important if true." The inventor says, it appears certain that Minghetti and the Italian Cabinet are doing all they can in the diplomatic world to impose the abrogation of the Prince Imperial's claim to the throne of France. The Empress Eugenie is in constant communication with Victor Emmanuel, intrigue in the person of her son, is wholly unfounded. There is a little of truth in the assertion. What plots or schemes Bismarck and the Robber-King may be engaged in we cannot say; but it is calculated upon the Empress to say that she is at all mixed up with them. The Empress is a much more devoted friend of the Pope, and of the temporal power, than can be found fault with by the French revolutionists. These officials have no doubt had their hands made compromising pacts, displayed by the invaders, seems to have taken every possible care not to wound the feelings of the inhabitants, and bears testimony to the excellent spirit in which he has been always met by the French population of Alsace

The Great Aerial Trip to Europe.

The New York Daily Graphic publishes the following facts regarding the coming aerial tour to Europe:—"In all human probability the Daily Graphic irons Atlantic balloon expedition will set sail from the Capitol grounds, Brooklyn, on Wednesday, September 10th. There is some uncertainty regarding the precise time, as the weather may not be favorable and the gas company not be able to spare the 400,000 cubic feet of gas required; but it is hoped the ascension will not be later than the 10th. The great air ship is now well advanced towards completion, and a large force of men is engaged in finishing the various apparatus. All the parts will be completed and got together in a few days, when the balloon will be carefully exhibited on the Capitol grounds, commencing next Saturday and continuing day and evening until the ascension. It was at first intended the balloon should start without any preliminary public exhibition, but in consequence of the earnest desire manifested by the public press, the Graphic Company have decided to make the exhibition."

The following is a description of the balloon: The nine great sections are each 176 feet wide and 36 feet high, when inflated, 118 feet; diameter, when inflated, 118 feet; circumference, when inflated, 335 feet; extreme length, from crown of balloon to keel of boat, 160 feet; height of car, 15 feet; cloth required, 4,310 yards; in sewing, ten miles of rope was used; gas required to fill balloon, 400,000 feet; weight of entire apparatus, 7,000 pounds; cost, nearly $15,000.

STANZAS.

AT ANCHE MATELY INSCRIBED TO MRS. PANTON, OF SANTA CRARA.

O faithful servant of the Lord,
Once more He bids thee share
With Him the bitter cup of grief—
Submissive bear of prayer
Once more upon thy trembling soul,
Bowed down beneath its loss,
With crushing love He intensifies
The shadow of His cross.

The awful gloom of sudden death
Around thy way is thrown,
A crushing weight of grief is mine,
Alas! to bear alone.

When other sorrows smote thy life
Thy husband's love was near,
With thee to mourn thy early dead,
To comfort, soothe and cheer.

But lonely is thy home to-day,
And widowed is thy breast;
The cruel blow of death has rent
Thy life's love chain apart.

But, faithful servant of the Lord,
True soul by grief bowed down,
Lo! angel hands are stretched to aid
And lead thee to thy crown.

Lo! angel hands are stretched to aid
And lead thee up that bright
Home beauty path side of last
Before the Throne of Light

There Faith and Hope thy trusting soul
Have taught to look for dead,
Amid the ransomed hosts of earth
Bought by the blood Christ shed.

Beyond the reach of earthly care,
Its wearying toil and pain,
Once sheltered in His bosom love
No God upon the cross.

Within the beauty of that realm
To which thy soul is drawn,
Through the dark midnight of thy grief
To the eternal dawn.

There, faithful heart, by sorrow tried,
Thy fadeless love shall know
Its truest rewards—the sacred peace
Unknown to man below.

MARY WOODLAND, September, 1873.

MINING SUMMARY.

BUTTE COUNTY.

The Butte Record says: Tuttion & Knox have fourteen white men and thirty Chinamen at work on their extensive tunnel claim at the head of Rush Creek, in Plumas county. The National, speaking of this enterprise, says the water right formerly belonged to Jake Settrin, who sold to Tuttion & Knox. These gentlemen are now using at the point mentioned a capacious reservoir, with a dam, which will be forty feet high. The work will be completed in two months, and will carry a large volume of water to the rich claims along the east branch of the North Fork of the Feather river. The great desideratum in this region is water. For many years the patient inhabitants of Butte, Yuba, Sierra, Plumas and Lassen counties have struggled to hold their claims, and endured great privations, assisted always by the knowledge that they possessed the richest gold placers on this coast, and buoyed up by the hope that some day an engrossing capitalist would assist them in unearthing the precious treasure. The attention of capital is at last turned thitherward, and the time is not far distant when the rear of the hydraulic pipe will be heard in every gulch and ravine in that rich mining district.

CALAVERAS COUNTY.

The following items are from the Calaveras Chronicle of late date:

Reed & Manly, proprietors of the Lone Star claim at West Point, brought down $5,000 the other day. In addition to the crushing of a small quantity of rock. They inform us that the ledge is large and of unspeakable, and that its yield will be greater in the future than to the past.

Sinking has been carried at the Prussian Hill on account of hard ground. The party who leased the claim have not been unable to cut a large quantity of ore and test it in the mill belonging to the mine. The new Cornish pumping engine is also unable the Superintendent to make good leadway in sinking the shaft. The Saunderson mine is now in fine working order.

Lone Star crushes about very fine ore forth one of the former mills from the 40 stamps $4,000. A lot of ore from one of the upper tunnels amalgamated pretty on account of base metal, and crushing this ore is now discontinued. The Harris mine is doing well, slowly. The Zamboro shows a fine body of ore in the south level, over three feet thick. The ore carries considerable galena, and gold can be seen in all portions of the ore out on the dump. A contract is offered by the Superintendent to sink the main shaft one hundred feet deeper. Ohio Consolidated intend to sink a new shaft on the east vein; a twenty five horse power engine will be put on the shaft. Some handsome looking ore comes out here. The lot shaft is being repaired to keep in safe condition, until the mine is freed from water. The drift now over a hundred yards southeast of Bartnie, which yielded well in low water times, is being started in a workmanlike manner. We learn that Bartnie stoping and extending tunnel. Atlantic yielding ore worth $50 per ton.

INYO COUNTY.

A friend in this new district, located twenty miles south of Pipe's ranch, writes the Inyo Independent, under date of August 23rd, the following encouraging account of the prospects: We are just opening up a new mining district which, I think, will soon speak for itself, for we have some very good indications; but the mines are small to each individual claim, and the boys are going to know what there is under ground. Every body prospecting down from five to fifty feet. Most of the mines produce smelting ore, and away from the lead $50 to $100 per ton. Some assay four ton to ten feet side, and situated in a finely timbered country.

NEVADA COUNTY.

The Transcript of the 28th says the in jury to the Mohawk mine by water caused by tapping the old work has been about repaired. The Hendricks mine is producing extra fine ore, both in quality and greater in quantity than ever before. The ore when extracted is assorted; the rich sulphurets are shipped and the inferior grades are worked at the Pioche works.

PLUMAS COUNTY.

The following items are from the Plumas National of August 30:

John Klein has located an extensive gravel mine, which lies to the east of Meadow Valley. The gravel is said to be extremely well and the facilities for water are excellent.

Recently, at Nawton Flat, the O'Neill brothers struck what is supposed to be the black channel of the ancient river bed, and found it to be extremely rich. In a short time they washed out twenty-four dollars in heavy coarse gold. From now on will doubtless prove to be one of the richest on the north side of the valley.

NEVADA.

The Pioche Record says times are dull in Pioche. The Aurora Times learns from authentic sources that exceedingly rich goldbearing quarts has recently been discovered 200 feet below the surface of Paradise part of this county, seven or eight miles from the copper mines now employing 250 men.

The Virginia Enterprise says: Sunday was a day of hard ground. The party who leased the mine on the Ophir ground is unable the Superintendent to make good leadway in sinking the shaft on the Saunderson mine is now in fine working order.

Lone Star crushes about very fine ore forth one of the former mills from the 40 stamps $4,000. ## TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

Again we find ourselves under the disagreeable necessity of requesting our subscribers throughout the country to remit promptly their indebtedness to us. There is a large amount owing to us, but for some weeks we have not been receiving more than one-fifth of the amount we are in daily need of. Our early prosperous one, so that we believe our friends will be willing to assist us in meeting their accounts, which, individually, are small, though in the aggregate amount up to be a very respectable sum indeed. We will in future, as THE MONITOR is published semi-monthly, be compelled to strictly adhere to our published terms, and that subscription can know in advance when they may hand their money in their own vicinity. We would also call attention to the fact that a Sunday Catholic journal, worthy in every respect of the name, is a necessity to the Catholic population of the Pacific Coast, and we certainly are not preferring to in expecting a proper share of their support. We have labored hard to make it such a paper as it now is, and we believe we have succeeded in the effort. We ask our friends, for we believe on paper in America can boast of a better subscriber; but the sums due are small in each individual case, and we feel sure that a prompt payment of pay four dollars in twelve months is not a difficult matter for any one to accomplish; the very fact of prompt payment will prove a benefit to the subscriber, as they are likely to forget a settlement when

Undersigned Vigor.

The feeble and delightful sensation that they are in a more hopeless condition than they really are. The resources of nature are not easily exhausted. Even in the most desperate cases of disease, where there are heavy and distressing, the complexion pallid, the eyes sunken, the nerves unstrung, and the mind depressed, there is generally a reserve of latent power behind such palpable evidences of weakness. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters calls into action this hidden power, and the result is astonishing. Under its magic influence the blood is purified, the nerves strengthened, and the whole system invigorated. Appetite returns, digestion is established, and the sufferer is soon restored to health. Nothing else will do this work of so speedy, thorough and reliable manner as this genial tonic and alterative. Many of the symptoms of a course of Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. Eleventy, shower baths, the fresh breath, sea bathing, etc., may be temporarily beneficial, but are unreliable, as they do not reach the source of the evil. All physical derangements originate in the stomach, and as the functions of the assimilating, secretive and vital organs are dependent upon its healthy action, the first, and also in cases where both causes exist, the latter will be permanently relieved by an invigorating and salutary change in the condition of the patient, and, consequently, in the action of the stomach. For all forms of fever and ague, dyspepsia, a more chronic but formes of mind, a gradual return of strength, an increase of flesh, and a healthy complexion, these white, however, the constitution, if heart and feeble, will have been so much reinforced by the assimilation of invigorative medicine contained in the Bitters.

LONGINGS.

BY A COUNTRY CURATE.

O for a breeze from the Western Sea
To ruffle the life calm
Of ships that wait for the will of man
To bear on the balmy gale
Of the men who weave that they would come,
Wherever the ships may be.

Ships from the Western Sea!
Ships that bring many a story,
And again and again
Ships that are ships indeed,
Ships that are ships from the Western Sea!

Our head is rich; yet still we pine—
Our chambers hide our gold;
Nothing so gifts is your saintly ships,
Oh, bring us the Western Sea!

The light that lies in long-loved eyes,
The welcome we hope to see,
The strong arms of all who come
From the Western Sea!

Ah! do ye come! Ah! do ye come!
Our longing cry see story,
Our sugar hands are here to grasp—
Our hearts are here to beat
Out the light upon our cheek,
Your glad welcome to greet.

Then come again to the Holy Isle
And from the Western Sea!

Ah! thallous is long, and still they stay!
The tide is on the turn,
The sun is set and wait in the dismal dark
By the sound of the waters' moan.

Yet they will come—yet they will come,
Ye harbor for their eyes
Is the home-word air will then be dumb
With the welcome of their cries.

And we shall know when we hear THEIR cheer
And their glad voices ring
That they are they who have kept their vow
With their ships from their heart's Sea!
—Dublin Irishman.

Letter from Most Rev. Dr. Manning.

The subjoined letter from the Archbishop of Westminster was received by his friend the Most Rev. Dr. McGettigan, the Lord Primate of Ireland:

ST. EDMUND'S, WARE, August 16, 1873

and saw that the fireman shell had done its work but too surely. Its zone, a tear treasured on his eyelids, but the roar of battle called him with the stern voice of duty, and he rushed to join the struggle of his comrades in arms.

CHAPTER VI.

THE GELSBERG.

When Michel rejoined his comrades but a few minutes had passed, and yet seemed as if a year had gone by. They were not the same men by whose side he had been fighting. Up to the moment of his separation from them, hope was high within their hearts, or rather the certainty of ultimate conquest was in the breast of every man. No doubt there had been a surprise; no doubt the enemy developed himself in totally, unexpected strength, and no doubt, whether from natural courage, severe discipline or the inspiration of vast and overpowering numbers, he fought far better than was anticipated. Still the French could entertain no notion but that they had experienced just a temporary check; victory was made more difficult—that was all. But the revelation of defeat seemed to have come in a sort of lightning flash. It was probably the breaking of the ranks which had put the coup de grace to the hopes, the vanity of which had been shown by the ever-increasing mass of the charging Germans, and the renewed and ever-augmenting terror of their cannonade. And yet Michel felt, as he plunged into the hottest of the conflict, that there was no unworthy panic in the spirit in the minds of the French. The attempts to form and fill the gaps which artillery fire had made were often unsuccessful, but it was not through the lack of courage of those who were left. It is hard to make a steady advance line when front and rank men are cut down by the one shot, and the shell which has struck is scattering its fragments far and wide. And so, often the rank had to fall back before it closed. But it retreated face to the foe. For a little the musketry of the assailants would cease in fury, and then the German cavalry, sweeping through the narrow streets, would endeavor to ride down their resolute opponents, but here the chassepot and the mitrailleuse would do deadly work. This, however, could not last long. The immense numbers of the Germans enabled them to wind through the by-streets detachments almost as large as the whole force of the French, and it was only by the utmost exertion of bravery and new-found watchfulness that the French saved themselves from being actually surrounded and pent up within the little town.

Fighting as it were foot to foot they gained the issue port from which Michel had carried his message to the chief, and, finding resistance at an end, hold the Gelsberg against them till help comes."

"If the Prussians have not already got it," remarked the Major bitterly.

"Just so," answered the Brigadier.

As they spoke, their eyes were naturally turned towards the spot in question. The top of the hill was undergrain of shells. Below across the river they could see the German soldiers wading, some up to their arms in water, whilethers beyond were crossing in pontoons.

"Heavens! have they sprung out of the ground? Why, we must be engaged with forty or fifty thousand men. Is that their advance think you?"

"I fear not," said the Major with a shake of his head. "The advance in all probability is round the slope of the hill, and covered with that feu d'enfer."

"And there are not six companies on the Gelsberg," said the Brigadier bitterly.

"If they have possession of it before you can get round, what will you do?"

"Take it again, by God."

"With your handful? Impossible."

"Perhaps. But at all events I can get to the top, and if we cannot hold it, let them bury me there. Do you cover our rear here, and at the same time have an eye to those fellows across the river—not that you can do much though. Throw up a few skirmishes on the ridge to annoy them, and forward," he added, turning to his immediate command, and led the way by the road he had traversed a short time before.
